Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Mr. Wright:

I was delighted to receive from you the other day your very kind letter expressing these warm sentiments.

I feel as though my own contribution to the desegregation battle has indeed been feeble. Both my distance from the scene of the battle, as well as the limitations -- organisational and personal -- which are imposed on our activities have militated so far against any more vigorous participation. However, we are eager to move more deeply into the situation, in whatever manner seems most appropriate; and our determination, as of now, is to locate and enter those aspects of the problem in which we can be most effective.

I take this occasion to extend to you the greetings of the season.

Sincerely yours,

Edwin J. Lukas

SUBJECT: Davis v. St. Louis Housing Authority

DIGEST: U.S. District Court enjoins St. Louis Housing Authority from maintaining racial segregation in any of its public housing projects.

On December 27, 1955 the U.S. District Court (Eastern Division of the Eastern Judicial District of Missouri) ordered the City of St. Louis and the St. Louis Housing Authority to end their practice and policy of racial segregation in the public housing projects under their jurisdiction, management or control. The decision came in an action by a group of Negroes who claimed to have been excluded, solely because of their race and color, from certain low-cost housing developments erected and to be erected in the City of St. Louis.

The decision, handed down by U.S. District Judge George H. Moore, found that the plaintiffs were in desperate need of decent, safe and sanitary housing, that they qualified for public housing; that the City of St. Louis and the St. Louis Housing Authority, with the aid of the Public Housing Authority, have cleared slums in certain areas of the city and have constructed several low-rent, public housing projects; that such projects are erected in part with local tax-raised funds and in part with grants or assistance from the federal authorities; and that the defendants have adopted and maintained a policy of complete racial segregation in the assignment of public housing accommodations.

On the basis of these findings of fact the Court concluded that:

> The resolution, policy, custom, usage, conduct and practice of defendants in refusing to lease to plaintiffs ... and other eligible Negro applicants similarly situated, certain units of public housing under their administration, control and managment in accordance with a policy of racial segregation is a violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The Court thereupon ordered the City of St. Louis and the St. Louis Housing Authority to end their policy and practice of maintaining racial segregation in the public housing developments under their control and jurisdiction. They were also enjoined from refusing to lease or rent public housing accommodations to qualified Negroes on the grounds of race or color.

DIGEST: The Attorney General of Minnesota, has ruled that under the Minnesota Fair Employment Practices Act, the press may not be present at sessions at which the Commission is receiving information, discussing or acting upon specific complaints until the conciliation process has been completed.

In a ruling dated December 21st, Attorney General Miles Lord of the State of Minnesota advised Mrs. Eugenie Anderson, Chairman of the Minnesota Fair Employment Practices Commission, that the Fair Employment Practices Law prohibits the disclosure by the Commission to the press of any information concerning its efforts in a particular case to eliminate an unfair employment practice through education, conference, conciliation or persuasion until the conciliation process has been completed.

The ruling was handed down in response to a request for an opinion from the Chairman of the Fair Employment Practices Commission. The request arose out of possible ambiguity in the language of the Minnesota Act dealing with conciliation and persuasion. Subdivision 6 of Section 8 of the Minnesota Law reads as follows:

> "The commission may publish an account of a case in which the complaints has been dismissed or the terms of settlement of a case that has been voluntarily adjusted. Except as provied in other sections of this act, the commission shall not disclose any information concerning its efforts in a particular case to eliminate an unfair employment practice through education, conference, conciliation and persuasion." (Emphasis supplied)

This does not make clear whether representatives of the press could be present at sessions at which the Commission is receiving information, discussing, or acting upon specific complaints, and whether such information could be given to the press by Commission members or staff before the conciliation process was completed.

The Attorney General, after careful consideration of the statute, found that it was the intention of the Legislature to forbid any disclosure of information gathered by the Commission until after the process of conciliation had been completed. He pointed out that one basis for success in eliminating unfair employment practices by conciliation "is the feeling of freedom on the part of the parties to discuss the various difficulties involved in the particular situation without the fear of possible public disclosure and the effects thereof." The Attorney General added that the presence of the press when information was being received prior to conciliation "would serve as an inhibiting influence preventing the full effectiveness of the education, conference, conciliation and persuasion process."

The Attorney General went on to emphasize that "the right of representatives of the press to be present at Commission sessions is one which ought to be rarely restricted." But in the case of information accumulated prior to completion of the conciliation process, he found that the Legislature had intended that such data should not be made available to the press during the pendency of conciliation.

SUBJECT: Educational Activities of the Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights

DIGEST:

During the past two years, the Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights has addressed letters to all new employers in the State of Connecticut, to Connecticut newspapers, to housing authorities, to police chiefs, to taverns, restaurants, bars, etc. holding liquor licenses, to barbershops and barbers, to hospitals, to hairdressers and cosmetologists, to convalescent homes and homes for the aged, and to dentists, advising them of the existence of the law against discrimination, and of their duty to comply with that law.

It has just come to our attention that the Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights, since September 1953, has addressed letters to various groups which are subject to the Connecticut Law Against Discrimination, advising them of the provisions of the law and offering the Commission's assistance in insuring compliance with the statute. Since 1954, the Commission has mailed to all new employers in the State of Connecticut, on a semi-annual basis, a letter advising such employers that if they employ 5 or more persons, they are subject to the provisions of the Connecticut Fair Employment Practice Act. A copy of the Act is enclosed with the letter and the letter also offers the recipient any additional information he may seek concerning the law's operation.

On October 18, 1955, the Commission advised all Connecticut newspapers that an amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Act, adopted by the General Assembly effective October 1, 1955, makes it unlawful for any employer, employment agencies, labor organization or person to advertise for employment in such a manner as to restrict such employment so as to discriminate against individuals because of their race, color, religious creed, national origin or ancestry. The letter concludes with a statement that the recipient newspaper will want to pass this information on to those advertisers who may not be aware of the statute.

On the same date, the Connecticut Commission addressed a letter to all housing authorities administering both public and publicly-assisted housing in the State of Connecticut, advising them that the Connecticut Law Against Discrimination was amended, effective October 1, 1955, to authorize the Commission on Civil Rights to initiate complaints involving discrimination in such housing whenever the Commission has reason to believe that the law against discrimination was being violated in public or publicly assisted housing. With the letter was enclosed a copy of the law and the new amendment. The letter closed with a request for the cooperation of the housing authorities in carrying out the new law.

On December 1, 1955, a letter was sent jointly by the Recorder of the Connecticut State Dental Commission and the Chairman of the Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights to all dentists in the State of Connecticut. This letter called the attention of the recipients to the fact that the Connecticut Public Accommodations Statute contains provisions barring discrimination on the basis of race, creed or color by any establishment which caters or offers its services or facilities to the general public. The letter concludes by pointing out that a dentist may accept patients on the basis of the nature of the professional services he offers to the general public, but he may not deny his services to any person solely by reason of race, creed or color.

On November 17, 1954, a letter was sent jointly by the Chairman of the Commission on Civil Rights and the State Commissioner of Health to all owners of convalescent homes and homes for the aged, calling their attention to the fact that the Connecticut Public Accommodations Statute barred discrimination by any establishment which offered its services to the general public. The letter, like the letter sent to dentists, stated that such homes may set standards for the acceptance of aged persons, but these standards could not legally include race, creed or color. The services of such homes which solicit patronage from the general public must be made available to all persons without discrimination because of race, creed or color.

In September 1953, two similar letters were sent by the Commission on Civil Rights, one to all police chiefs in the State and the other to all taverns, restaurants, etc., which had permits for dispensing alcoholic beverages from the State Liquor Control Commission. The letter to police chiefs called their attention to the recently amended public accommodations law barring discrimination on the basis of race, creed or color by places of public accommodation, and making such discrimination a misdemeanor. The letter went on to state that persons so discriminated against might summon a police officer to their help. The letter, therefore, requested the police chiefs to advise all their officers of the change in the law. The letter to taverns and restaurants holding liquor licenses, advised the recipients that their places of business are places of public accommodation under the Connecticut law and offered the recipient any additional information he might wish concerning the operation of the law.

On September 15, 1953, two letters went out jointly over the signatures of the Chairman of the Commission on Civil Rights and the State Commissioner of Health. One such letter went to all hairdressers and cosmetologists and the other went to all hospitals in the state. These letters called the attention of the recipients to the law against discrimination in places of public accommodation and stated that an operator of the type of establishment named might legally set standards for the acceptance of clients but these standards could not lawfully include race, creed or color.

Finally, on the same day, a letter went out jointly over the signature of the Chairman of the Commission on Civil Rights and the State Barber Examiner to all barbershops and barbers in the State. This letter, like the others, informed the recipients of the law against discrimination in places of public accommodation and advised them that while the managers of such establishments might set standards for the acceptance of clients, these standards could not legally include race, creed or color, nor could the standards set up operate as a device to exclude members of a particular racial or religious group.

These letters served to bring home to the operators of many types of places of public accommodation in the State of Connecticut that there is a law against discrimination based on race, creed or color in the state, and that they must comply with that law or face the risk of a possible prosecution under the law and even possible loss of their licenses.

Dear George:

As matters stand now, I plan to arrive in Atlanta at about 12 noon (Eastern Airlines Flight No. 517) on Thursday, March 1. I will call you soon after my arrival and arrange to meet you at your office. I may want to go over to New Orleans that very evening, so will only have a few hours to spend in your city.

However, it occurred to me, in preparation for our discussion, you might want to know broadly some of the aspects of the desegregation problem in which I will be interested, ~~in~~ in preparation for my meetings in New Orleans.

1. It would be enormously helpful to us if I could take away with me a map indicating the density of Negro population in the deep South (county by county, if possible; otherwise, city by city and state by state).

2. I would be very interested in knowing some further and late details concerning the anti-Semitic manifestations thus far exhibited by the White Citizens' Councils and other individuals and groups. (I don't know whether you have seen the reprint of the Desmond pieces that appeared in the Daily News here; I enclose a copy.)

3. I would be curious to know something of the strength the new Eastland group (the Federation for Constitutional Government) is picking up around the South, and whether it has attracted the "respectables" in significant numbers; also your views concerning its impact on the South.

There are a few other matters which I will want to discuss with you, but you will need little or no preparation for them.

I look forward to seeing you, and send you and Harold Fleming my warm regards.

Dear Ed:

It was good to see you the other afternoon. I hope your New Orleans meeting had a rewarding outcome.

You may recall my mention of the New York Times (or other) story reporting the official Soviet reaction to the Supreme Court ruling of May 1954. Unaccountably, though I remember it well, we don't seem to have the clipping. If you have a copy which you could share with us, we will greatly appreciate it. I am also looking forward to seeing your summary of foreign reaction to the Miss Lucy case.

I have a guilty feeling that I was in an unjustifiably negative mood when we had our all-too-brief conversation. Please chalk it up to transient weariness and give us another opportunity soon to plan together.

Dear Harold:

I send to you herewith a photostat of a piece that appeard in the New York Post on June 23, 1954, quoting Izvestia on the desegregation decision of the Supreme Court. It's the only story of the kind that we seem to be able to find, but it will serve your purpose admirably. I do not know how you plan to use it, but it might not be a bad idea to offer it to the press generally, in a release from the SRC. Perhaps this is as good a time as any to remind the country of the Soviet attitude toward the decision.

By no means feel guilty concerning your "negative mood" during our meeting the other day. I marvel at your and George's patience in dealing with the hot problems that confront you. The New Orleans meeting served to confirm the discouragement both of you felt when I discussed the Southern situation with you. The situation is indeed serious, and I think that we are prepared to become more active than we have been.

I trust I shall see something of you and George soon. Warm regards.

Dear Ed:

Thanks so much for the photostat of the UP article quoting Izvestia on the desegregation decision. With a few changes, it could easily pass as the comment of some of our demagogues. We certainly want to revive this significant parallelism.

We had a good visit from Seymour Samet the other day. I was much impressed with his idea of seeking the establishment of a Department of Integration within the U.S. Office of Education. We also discussed the desirability of the Administration quietly using its influence with top business and industrial leaders in the South. I hope you will find ways to give both of these ideas a boost.

THE PLACE OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE IN EDUCATION

Opie L. Shelton, Executive Vice-President, Baton Rouge Chamber of Commerce before Southern Association of Chamber of Commerce Executives, Shreveport, March 20, 1956

Traditionally, this subject of the place of the Chamber of Commerce in the field of education has concerned itself with B-E Days, E-B Days, Career Opportunity Days, Teacher Welcomes and all of the dozens of worthwhile programs such as you and I have been helping to sponsor over the years. We took our cue from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which, in my opinion, has done more to encourage an interest in our educational processes than has any other single American group.

All of our efforts have played an important role in helping to stimulate better education in the various communities we serve.

The basic justification for most of our efforts in the field of education has been the economics involved. We proved to ourselves that good education is good business. And since a chamber's prime purpose is the strengthening of the economy of the area it serves, education has occupied a leading position on most chamber's program of work.

But the Supreme Court's decision concerning the integration of our schools may have knocked our time-honored programs into a cocked hat.

Fifteen years ago no one would have thought of picking up a magazine or a newspaper and reading a mention of syphilis or gonorrhea. Talk of such things just wasn't proper. To much the same degree we in chambers of commerce over the South have avoided any mention of the words segregation or integration.

We may as well meet the subject head on. The South faces a crisis such as it has not met in its lifetime. Paramount in this complex situation are our schools. The question: where do we go from here?

Leave the sociological aspects of this situation to the trained sociologist and anthropologist. We are not qualified in that field. Let's explore for a few minutes, however, the economic aspects which are presented.

Over the years we have described our job as being one of creating new dollars for our community, with no particular interest in who were the principal beneficiaries. We have said that our job was that of upgrading the economic level of all of the people of that area in which we labored. And, for the most part, we have been successful in our efforts.

Incidents already left in the wake of the Supreme Court decision makes it crystal-clear that it is the business man of the South, such as you and I represent, who is to be the one caught in the economic squeeze that threatens.

Already there have been cases of boycott, Negro against white, white against Negro, and even white against white. Falstaff beer lost a large part of its business in Mississippi when it was publicized that in April of 1945, before the Supreme Court decision, Falstaff bought a $500 life membership in the NAACP for one of its Negro salesmen in St. Louis. A similar boycott hit Philip Morris cigarettes because of that company's purported assistance to interracial causes. Ford Motor Company has felt the heat. Ford's offense, in the eyes of many Southerners, is its indirect contribution through the Ford Foundation and the Fund for the Republic to interracial groups. Hart's Bakeries, of Memphis, suffered a 6% to 10% loss of business when an anti-integration group accused the company of donating $50,000 to the NAACP. The bakery denied the accusation, but the harm was already done.

One Coca-Cola bottler is being boycotted by Negroes because of his refusal to service a Negro retailer while the whites of the same community are urging a boycott of the same firm because Coca-Cola employs Negroes in its TV programs and advertising. The boycott of the Montgomery bus system by Negroes is one of the most publicized of the current boycotts. A similar boycott in my own city of Baton Rouge some three years ago all but broke the back of our bus company.

It may be true that these are but isolated incidents. But what guarantee does your local business man member have that the malignancy won't spread and that eventually he too will become a victim? He may not be saying this out loud, but naturally he is apprehensive.

Extremists on both sides have been those most quoted in the press during all of this internecine warfare. It is rare that a calm voice has emerged from the turmoil. Because this is a subject which reaches deep into the hearts and minds of men and because it appears to be so absolutely devoid of solution it isn't easy to interject dispassionate thinking.

But think we must. Failure to find a solution to the present chaos presents alternatives which threaten our very future. Failure of solution can bring about such catasthropic events as the very abandonment of our public school system. Failure could even lead to bitter bloodshed and economic collapse.

So why pretend any longer that we can merely continue to stage an occasional B-E Day or an E-B Day and thereby discharge our responsibility to our educational systems. The tempo of present day events demands that, distasteful though it may be, we look and look well for the best possible solution to the present and omnipresent turmoil.

When any other matter of extreme importance faces our community to whom do we turn for counsel and advice? Why, to the best thought leaders of our community, of course. To the type of men who make up your board of directors and mine. It is they who are always charged with coming up with a solution to the many vexing problems which beset community life. Why, then, should we now have them abdicate their community responsibility because of the explosiveness of this problem?

It is my sincere belief that the greatest single contribution we who serve Southern Chambers of Commerce can make is to work at the individual community level to help ameliorate a situation which so far has been pretty well left up to the extremists of both sides.

I say on the local level because it is obvious that the same solution doesn't pertain to any two cities. That which will work in Baton Rouge would probably never serve as a guide in Greenville, Mississippi. Nor would the Greenville solution serve as a model for any other city.

I use the word "solution" because of the lack of a better word in my vocabulary. There is really no solution, but there has to be a BEST WAY to do everything.

The time to decide upon that BEST WAY is not when incidents occur which will impair the best thinking of our community leaders. It is now, before your city and mine feels the full impact of that which promises to lie ahead. I can't help but believe that there are men of both races in every community who are men of reason and who abhor that which has resulted from the Supreme Court's decision on the integration of schools. But if they are reluctant to speak out then we must accept that which follows without protest.

Boycotts, economic reprisals, the possibility of abandoning our public schools, incidents of violence, irresponsible statements -- these are new factors which will now be given consideration by industry and business when they consider a Southern location, each to varying degrees.

Do you not agree, then, that the economics involved require that these are matters worthy of consideration by our boards of directors? Are we to look upon this serious situation believing that it will disappear if only we pay it no heed? Or are we going to: first, admit that an economic threat exists, and second, face up to the problem, using the best brains our community affords.

That to me, in this year of our Lord nineteen hundred and fifty-six is the place of the Chamber of Commerce in Education.

RECEIVED MAR 26 1956

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Mr. Will Maslow advised me that he had spoken with you about accepting an invitation to participate in our National Biennial Convention on Friday, April 13th, at the Hotel Biltmore in New York City.

We are pleased that you have accepted and will be part of a panel presentation which we hope will help considerably in the clarification of many questions and problems in the minds and hearts of our members.

This symposium will be held on Friday afternoon, April 13th, from 2:00 to 5:00 p.m. at the Hotel Biltmore in New York City. The title is THE JEWISH STAKE IN THE SOUTH. The other participants are: Mr. Harry L. Golden, editor of the Carolina Israelite, and Judge Hubert T. Delany.

We are indeed happy to provide our delegates with an opportunity to listen to a representative of the South who will present the issues and the problems that have created the difficulties and the disturbances which now afflict our democracy.

Please be good enough to advise us of your schedule and arrival and if you have any other questions relating to your role, please feel free to ask for additional information.

Again, thank you.

Sincerely yours,

Philip F. Bernstein

Dear Mr. Gary:

My value to the convention stems from the fact that I will be coming there out of the then current situation in the South. Our situation varies so rapidly that I hesitate greatly to say now what will be right to say April 13.

One thing I suppose I will be saying is that it has been my experience that people don't really get much out of this life until they organize. And that the meaning of the last two or three years and particularly of events at Montgomery and Orangeburg is that the Negro people are now organizing all the way down. Not formally but in an unanimity of resistance. And that therefore those who suppose they can push Negro people back down again are mistaken. Each Southern community will have to realize it is now dealing with a Negro group different in quality with what they were before. It now becomes needful to meet and deal with responsible Negro persons within a framework of equality and human dignity. Those communities which earliest perceive this and move ahead in this spirit will be the more successful Southern towns.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell

In an effort to facilitate press coverage of your talk at our Convention, I would appreciate it if you would submit either the full text of your speech or several paragraphs which I can use for news releases. Although the Convention may still appear to be a long way off, I am sure you realize that time has a nasty habit of sneaking up and surprising us when we least expect it. The sooner I receive your remarks, the sooner I will be able to incorporate them into a news release.

Please remember time is essential. Would you kindly send your statement to me, personally, at the American Jewish Congress.

In my letter of March 22, I neglected to add the information that the American Jewish Congress will take care of all the expenses that you will incur from your trip to and from New York for your participation in our National Biennial Convention on Friday, April 13.

I take pleasure in enclosing a preliminary program which lists all of the sessions of our convention. As you no doubt can well appreciate, we cannot go to press until sometime later this week with a final printed program because of several changes which have occurred.

As soon as this program is ready, I will send you copies. Please feel free to recommend any suggestions for our program.

Thank you.

Much pleased to be asked to be a professor again and to lecture at the New School.

This far ahead nothing whatever interferes with October 2, 1956; and you can count on me to show. Quite all right for the compensation to be expenses alone.

I privately hope that by October 1956 the situation in the South will not be a crisis. So I would vote for softening that scaring title.

RECEIVED MAR 30 1956

Dear George:

The Sidney Hillman Foundation and the New School for Social Research have asked me to arrange the third annual series of Hillman Lectures on Civil Liberty to be given at the New School next Fall. These fifteen talks will be delivered on Tuesday nights from 8:30 to 10:10 p.m. I enclose a bulletin describing last year's course to give you an idea of the variety and quality of our lecturers.

The first 45 minutes of each session will be taped for rebroadcast, probably over Station WNYC, the municipally owned radio station which broadcast the series last year. The remaining 55 minutes is set aside for a question period. The class, which averages about 100, consists for the most part of alert and well-informed adults. Each part of the session is informal.

We should very much like to have you give the second lecture in the series to b e entitled "The Crisis in the South" on Tuesday, October 2, 1956. I know that date is far off but the New School is now preparing its Fall catalogue and would appreciate a prompt reply.

I am asking Roy Wilkins of the NAACP to give the third lecture tentatively titled "Desegregation and Gradualism."

An honorarium of $50 is paid to each guest lecturer but in your case we can pay your travel expenses to and from Atlanta but no additional honorarium.

If either the topic, the title or the date is not satisfactory, would you please telephone me collect at TRafalgar 9-4500 and perhaps we can agree on a date and title that you prefer.

In these confused times, it is important for Northerners to realize that there are liberals in the South who do not believe in segregation and I am sure they will profit by and enjoy hearing you. I hope therefore that you can attend.

Sincerely,

Will

THE NEED TO DEFEND CIVIL LIBERTIES

"The greatest tyranny has the smallest beginnings. From precedents overlooked, from remonstrances despised, from grievances treated with ridicule, from powerless men oppressed with impunity, and over-bearing men tolerated with complaisance, springs the tyrannical usage which generations of wise and good men may hereafter preserve and lament and resist in vain. . . . Hence the necessity of denouncing with unwearied and even troublesome perseverance a single act of oppression. Let it alone, and it stands on record. The country has allowed it, and when it is at last provoked to a late indignation it finds itself gagged with the record of its own compulsion."

Dear Harold:

I am sorry that it has taken me so long to get to the inquiry in your letter of March 13, in which you comment on Seymour Samet's proposals that a Department of Integration be established within the U.S. Office of Education, and that the Administration seek some way of using its influence with leaders in business and industry.

I am not altogether certain that I understand what the functions of the Department of Integration would be, save, perhaps, to promote the orderly implementation of the Supreme Court decision. Actually, as you know, the U.S. Office of Education engages largely in research, and acts as a resource for school systems when called upon for data or help. I would strongly doubt that intransigent Southern states would seek the help of the Department or, if the latter were to offer its help, that that offer would be accepted.

However, the use of influential business and industrial leaders is something that has been on the top of our heads for a long time. We are more and more persuaded -- as you must be -- that when leadership of the "middle force" is finally found, it will be drawn from the ranks of business and industry, as well as from the churches.

Incidentally, have you thought of reprinting the New York Times piece on the hesitancy of businessmen to expand their operations in the South until tensions have disappeared? This piece should be given wide circulation, unless it was generally reproduced or picked up by other newspapers in the South. If you have not seen that item, of course we will send it to you.

George was here for a few days and performed his usually creditable job, charming and enlightening his audiences.

My warm regards.

Sincerely,

Edwin J. Lukas

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

MEMORANDUM

April 18, 1956

TO Robert E. Bondy, Director
National Social Welfare Assembly

FROM Theodore Leskes

SUBJECT The proposed regulation of the Internal Revenue Service with respect to tax-exempt organizations

In 1954 the Congress enacted a completely recodified tax law.[1] That action by Congress necessitated revising and renumbering the old tax regulations and that is the process currently being followed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in publishing "proposed" or "tentative" regulations in the Federal Register[2] and inviting the submission of "any data, views, or arguments pertaining thereto."

I. Background

A. In the 1954 recodification of the Internal Revenue Code, Section 101 (6), which enumerated and described the organizations entitled to tax exemption, was edited somewhat and renumbered Section 501 (c)(3). Since the proposed regulation, when finalized and adopted, will be the official interpretation by the Internal Revenue Service of Section 501 (c)(3), a good beginning point for this memorandum would be the text of the section of the Code to be interpreted by the proposed regulations. Subdivision (c) reads as follows:

> (c) List of exempt organizations.- The following organizations are referred to in subsection (a): (3) corporations, and any community chest, fund or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual, no substantial part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation, and which does not participate in, or intervene in (including the publishing or distributing of statements), any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office.[3]

[2] 21 F.R. 461, January 21, 1956.

[3] The underscored language is new and was added by the 1954 revision of the section.

B. A second type of tax exemption, provided under subparagraph (4) of Section 501 (c), should not be confused with the tax exemption provided under subparagraph (3). A non-profit organization which is operated exclusively "for the promotion of social welfare" is not required to pay Federal income taxes under subparagraph (4). To that extent it is relieved of certain tax responsibilities and liabilities. However, contributions and donations made to "social welfare" organizations which are exempt from taxes under subparagraph (4) are not deductible from the gross income of the donor on his income tax returns. This is the type of Federal tax exemption that was formerly granted under Section 101 (8) of the old Code.

C. Historically, the Internal Revenue Service has granted Section 101 (8) exemptions to many groups to which it has denied the much more significant exemption afforded to organizations described as "religious, charitable, scientific, literary or educational" under the old Section 101 (6) -- the new Section 501 (c)(3).

II. The Proposed Regulations

A number of obvious and significant changes appear in the proposed regulation interpreting Section 501 (c)(3) when it is contrasted with the old regulation that expounded Section 101 (6).

A. Under the category "General" four tests are set forth for an organization to be entitled to exemption. They are:

(i) It must be organized and operated exclusively for one or more of the specified purposes;

(ii) Its net earnings must not inure in whole or in part to the benefit of private shareholders or individuals;

(iii) It must not by any substantial part of its activities attempt to influence legislation by propaganda or otherwise; and

(iv) It must not participate, or intervene, in any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office.

The "specified purposes" mentioned in the first test are "religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary or educational." The second and third tests are unchanged. The fourth test is new and would cause the proposed regulation to conform to the new language of the Code.

A completely new paragraph has been added in the proposed regulation to clarify what is meant by "organized and operated exclusively" for one or more of the enumerated purposes.

> For the purposes of Section 501 (c)(3) an organization is deemed to be formed and operated exclusively for one or more of the purposes specified therein if its principal, primary and predominant purposes, and substantially all of its activities, are devoted to such specified purpose or purposes. Thus, an activity which is in fact incidental, secondary or subservient to an organization's exempt purpose or purposes and which, when weighed against the whole of the activities of the organization, is less than a sub> stantial part of the total, will not ordinarily operate to deny exemption. See, however....restrictions upon all political activities.

B. An attempt has been made to give additional examples of activities that bring an organization within the category of "charitable." The relief of "distress, or other conditions of similar public concern" is added to "poverty" as a charitable "purpose" which would tend to bring an organization within the tax exempt class. Also, the proposed regulation expressly recognizes that receipt of payment for services by a hospital "will not necessarily preclude exemption" provided the other requisite tests are met.

C. The most extensive changes, by both deletions and additions, are proposed to be made in that portion of the tentative regulations that defines what activities are "educational." In this connection, we must bear in mind that the Internal Revenue Code itself makes a distinction between the formal type of educational institution (one with a student body, curriculum and faculty) and the informal type.

1. The old regulation contained a sentence that read "an organization formed, or availed of, to disseminate controversial or partisan propaganda is not an educational organization within the meaning of the Code." Later, the Internal Revenue Service found it necessary to add:

> However, the publication of books or the giving of lectures advocating a cause of a controversial nature shall not of itself be sufficient to deny an organization the exemption, if carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation forms no substantial part of its activities, its principal purpose and substantially all of its activities being clearly of a nom-partisan, non-controversial, and educational nature.

Both of these sentences are omitted from the proposed regulations. In their place there appears the following language as a description of the kind of "educational" activity that is deemed to warrant tax exemption:

> In the determination of whether an organization is exempt under this section consideration will be given not only to the purposes for which it was organized, and the powers it possesses, but also to the methods of its operation. To qualify as an exempt educational organization the methods employed by it must in fact be educational. Thus, not only the purpose but also the activities of such an organization must be designed to disseminate knowledge and basic factual material rather than unsupported opinion. The fact that an organization has a particular viewpoint, or takes a particular position, with respect to the subject or subjects presented by it, and that it openly advocates such position, will not of itself operate to deny exemption if in its presentation of the subject or subjects there is a full exposition of the facts upon which the advocated position is premised whereby the individual or the public may form independent opinions > or conclusions based upon a fair presentation of pertinent factual material. Conversely, exemption may not be allowed under this section to an organization whose principal function, accomplished through its publications, lectures, or other media, is the presentation of opinion without pertinent facts which would permit the individual or the public to reach independent and informed conclusions.

2. The old regulation tended to stress that an educational organization was primarily one engaged in improving or developing "the capabilities of the individual." "Under exceptional circumstances" an organization whose primary purpose was the instruction of "the public" could also qualify as educational. Significantly, the proposed regulation omits the phrase "under exceptional circumstances."

3. A completely new paragraph interprets the term "educational" as including an organization that conducts a fair or exposition, provided it (the organization) meets all the other requirements of Section 501 (c)(3). However, if its "primary purpose" is to bring about the "betterment of the conditions of persons engaged in particular pursuits, or the improvement of products," the organization may be denied exemption as an "educational or a scientific organization" within the meaning of the section.

D. An organization formed to test electrical products to determine whether they are safe for use by the general public is cited as an example of an organization that qualifies for exemption under Section 501 (c)(3) as an organization "operated exclusively for...testing for public safety" provided it meets the other three tests set forth above.

E. A wholly new section of the proposed regulation is headed "Proscribed Activities." It deals with "attempting to influence legislation" and "political activities" as two categories of proscribed activities.

In the category "attempting to influence legislation" the proposed regulation states that if substantially all of the activities of an exempt organization are actually devoted to the exempt purposes, "an incidental advocacy of legislation will not operate to deny exemption." The incidental publication of books "which advocate or oppose an issue which is or may be, the subject of legislative concern" is cited as an illustration. This portion of the proposed regulation states that:

> Exemption will be denied if a substantial part of the activities of an organization consists of activities such as the publication or distribution of materials which present but one side of an issue and advocate legislation thereon, or the solicitation of the votes of legislators for or against legislative proposals, or the presentation at political conventions of issues on which legislation is sought.

Although the proposed regulation, like its predecessor, does not state any percentage figure of staff time or agency budget that would be considered "substantial," it does recognize that substantiality can only be measured "in connection with all other activities of the organization."

Under the category "political activities" the proposed regulation would provide that tax exemption will be denied if the organization "participates or intervenes in any political campaign on behalf of any candidate for public office" whether such office be national, state or local. The publication or distribution of written or printed statements or the making of oral statements on behalf of a candidate is deemed participation or intervention. The proposed regulation recognizes that the "coincidental advocacy" of a principle or an issue is distinguishable from "the advocacy of the candidacy of an individual."

F. The section of the proposed regulation that describes the type of organizations entitled to exemption under subparagraph (4) of Section 501 (c) has the following significant language:

> If the purpose and methods of operation of an organization which promotes social welfare are such that they meet the requirements of Section 501 (c)(3) and the regulations thereunder such organization may qualify for exemption under Section 501 (c)(3).

This makes it clear that an organization may be engaged in "social welfare" activities which tend to benefit "mankind generally" and still be classified as an "educational organization" entitled to exemption under Section 501 (c)(3) rather than necessarily being relegated to the less valuable exemption under subparagraph (4).

III. The Hearings

Public hearings were held in Washington on April 10, 11 and 12, 1956 by the Internal Revenue Service on the proposed regulations covering tax exempt organizations.

The first day's hearings were concerned with a discussion of churches and their functions. Some disagreement arose over the treatment by the Internal Revenue Service of commercial enterprises run for a profit by certain religious groups, with the profit devoted exclusively for church and church-related activities. There was also some discussion of the fact that the less formally constituted religious groups and organizations sometimes find their related activities disadvantaged as contrasted with the tax benefits enjoyed by similar activities of the more formally organized churches which require clerical supervision and control over all church-related activities. Present at the April 10th sessions were representatives of the American Humanist Association, Christian Brothers, National Catholic Welfare Conference, American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State, National Council of the Churches of Christ, Methodist Publishing House, Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs, Social Legislation and Information Service, Religious News Service and the American Bar Association.

On April 11, 1956 representatives of law, accounting and banking firms discussed those aspects of the proposed regulations which would not be of concern to us.

On April 12, the last day of the hearings, an attorney, Arthur K. Mason of the Washington law firm of Chapman, Walsh & O'Connell, testified with respect to three portions of the proposed regulation that are of immediate interest. The first portion of the regulation that was criticized was that which requires "a full exposition of the facts" upon which the organization's position is premised so as to enable the individual or the public to form "independent opinions or conclusions based upon a fair presentation of pertinent factual material." It was pointed out that the word "full" was a potential mischief-maker. How does one ascertain that a particular position has been documented by all the facts? Wouldn't such documentation make any presentation of a viewpoint "unduly lengthy and prolix?" It was suggested to the Internal Revenue Service that the proposed regulation require a "fair" presentation (instead of a "full" presentation) of the "principal pertinent facts" (rather than "of the facts") upon which the advocated position is premised so as to enable the individual or public to "form independent opinions or conclusions."

The second suggestion dealt with the same portion of the proposed regulation. It was noted that grants-in-aid and research fellowships are today's common tools of advanced study. A sponsoring organization frequently has no control over the results, or even over the form of the published document, that eventuate from such grants-in-aid. It was therefore proposed that tax-exempt educational organizations not be penalized if they provide financial assistance to independent research or studies, and if the publications embodying the results of such studies openly advocate a particular position or take a particular viewpoint; provided the tax-exempt organization did not control or dictate in advance the conclusions of the study, and provided further that the organization does not use such grants-in-aid as a device to promote the publication of a particular point of view.

The third proposal dealt with that section of the tentative regulation which describes proscribed activities -- attempts to influence legislation. It was pointed out that by providing that tax-exempt status should not be lost by the "incidental" publication of books which "advocate or oppose an issue which is, or may be, the subject of legislative concern," the proposed regulation implies that tax exemption would be jeopardized by more than the "incidental" publication of such books. The recent case of Seasongood v. Commissioner[4] was then cited for the proposition that

> In one sense, nearly every effort made by individuals or organizations in the public interest and for the betterment of government necessarily, has as an indirect result at least, some influence on legislation.

The members of the technical staff of the Internal Revenue Service who were present at the public hearings appeared to see the implications of Mr. Mason's presentation but, as is customary at such hearings, they did not ask him any questions or take issue with any of his statements.

None of the constituent agencies of the National Social Welfare Assembly, none of the civil rights groups and none of the "right wing" organizations sent spokesmen to testify with respect to the proposed regulations.

IV. Conclusions

A. The proposed regulation is an improvement in several significant respects over the old regulation.

4 6 Cir., Dec. 14, 1955

B. An attempt has been made to spell out in greater detail what is meant by an "educational" organization other than the formal educational institution.

C. The proscribed activities are described at greater length and specific reference is made to the need to consider the totality of the agency's activities and program in determining whether attempts to influence legislation are a "substantial" part of the agency's effort. At what point the effort becomes substantial is still vague.

D. Participation or intervention in political campaigns on behalf of candidates for public office will cause the loss of tax-exempt status.

E. The regulation expressly recognizes that an "educational" organization may be engaged simultaneously in promoting "social welfare."

F. Strict compliance with several portions of the proposed regulation might be impossible.

G. It is not known at this time how the proposed regulation will actually be used by the Internal Revenue Service. In Helvering v. Bliss[5] the Supreme Court said that the provisions granting exemption of income devoted to charitable purposes are "liberalization of the law in the tax payer's favor, were begotten from motives of public policy, and are not to be narrowly construed." This theory dominates judicial thinking about tax exemption. Whether, under the new regulation, it also will dominate administrative thinking, remains to be seen.

Many thanks for the speech by Opie L. Shelton of the Chamber of Commerce. We had received an advance copy of the speech on a confidential basis from one of our contacts in Louisiana. We have already written and requested permission to reproduce Shelton's statement in New South. His answer was that it be done in toto and that things of course be not lifted out of context.

We appreciate your thoughtfulness in sending such things and trust you will continue to do so for occasionally we miss some things that you are apt to latch on to. We will reciprocate as we get new information. I have a choice bit I will be sending you soon. You had better get some stickum for your hair because your scalp will tingle and your hair stand on end.

Dear Ed:

Thanks for your letter about the recent article in Business Week. We were able to help their Southern man somewhat in pulling the facts together.

As you will see from the latest issue of New South, enclosed, we think the economic aspect of this question ought to be pushed in every possible way. I would like to see the Business Week article and other similar treatments of this subject given the widest possible dissemination. We have a good many things to choose from, and I had not decided whether Business Week was best for a large scale distribution. If you are interested in making some use of it too, maybe we could get together on it. We would probably farm out to our State groups the job of selecting key economic leaders and opinion makers within their respective states who ought to receive reprints.

Let me know what you are thinking.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

P.S. I note that Seymour Samet is distributing in mimeograph form the excellent speech by Opie Shelton, Executive Vice President of the Baton Rouge Chamber of Commerce. We have obtained Mr. Shelton's permission to print the speech and look upon it as an excellent choice for wide distribution.

Dear Ed:

We would like to take advantage of your most kind, tentative offer to send out someone with money-raising experience to advise with people in our twelve state organizations.

The best month is probably May. Could be June.

For our purposes it would be better if your man could take a trip that would get him to Richmond, Charlotte, Columbia, Atlanta, Daytona Beach, Montgomery, Jackson, New Orleans, Austin, Little Rock, Nashville, and Lexington. That is quite a number of cities, but are those in which the best work will be done if he can meet the people on their own ground where they can fetch in their local Board members who can help. If it has to be that way, we could squeeze people together, two states at a time, and cut down the cities to six.

Let me know what seems feasible, and we will arrange things at this end.

I have your letter of April 20.

I have spoken to Emil Bergen of the Joint Defense Appeal (the fund-raising arm of the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League) concerning some of the fund-raising problems of SRC. I am fairly certain that they will not be able to render assistance to you in precisely the fashion you describe in your letter, and when Fred Rauth was here I did not understand that the help he sought involved the extensive travelling that you describe. However, Mr. Bergen plans to be in Atlanta on or about May 23 and 24. He has consented to arrange an appointment with you during one of those days, and to give you the benefit of his rich experience in fund-raising activities, as well as such other help as might be feasible. Perhaps, in the course of that discussion, some other plans might be developed wiich would be serviceable to you.

I'm glad you think the April New South worth distributing to your staff. I'm sending separately a dozen copies for that purpose.

I'm also glad to have your suggestion that Business Week and the Shelton speech be distributed by the Southern Association of Chamber of Commerce Executives. We will see what can be done but I am not too hopeful about this or other Southern business groups distributing material of this kind. Their disposition is to deny the whole problem and to close their eyes in the hope that it will go away. Until they get alarmed enough to do something, I'm afraid organizations like ours will have to do most of the distributing. However, I will let you know if we have any luck.

Dear Harold:

Thank you for your letter of April 19. I was delighted to learn that your agency was helpful in pulling the material together for the Business Week piece. I think that the ideal group to distribute that, as well as the Shelton address, is the Southern Association of Chambers of Commerce Managers (I think that is the title of the group). I do not know where that Association is based, but you will have no difficulty in locating it and, I hope, in persuading it to help as the distributing source, to other Chambers of Commerce, to business executives, and others.

In that connection, we could use about one dozen additional copies of the April 1956 issue of New South. It is an excellent issue and I should like to distribute it to those members of our staff in New York who are presently concerned with some of the problems that have arisen in the South. Please bill us for the cost of these additional copies.

Dear Harold:

Max Birnbaum, the National Educational Consultant of the American Jewish Committee, and I are making a trip to several Southern communities during the week of May 14th. We plan to be in Atlanta on May 16th. Would it be possible for us to have lunch with you and Fred Routh on that day or to possibly meet you in the early part of the afternoon. If you could give us about an hour I think the meeting might be mutually rewarding. Please let me know by return mail so we can plan our itinerary accordingly.

Many thanks. Best regards.

That was a whirlwind trip to New York. I had no real hope of seeing you, but I was reluctant to leave without making an attempt to check in by telephone.

There are a good many ideas that I would welcome a chance to talk over with you but they will have to wait until one of us is in the other's territory again. Meanwhile very best regards.

Dear Ed:

We were greatly pleased with your offer to be helpful to us on advice about raising money. Fred Routh was pretty clear that you had thought maybe your people could help our people state by state. Then you wrote us and said no but Mr. Bergen would come to Atlanta. Today Mr. Bergen writes us and says he isn't coming to Atlanta now or in the foreseeable future on account of a last minute change in plans.

It was a good plan and it would still work. Will you try to dig around it a little and see if you can make it grow up again?

THE MIDDLE EAST FERMENT

Enclosed herewith is a Fact Sheet entitled "The Middle East Ferment" which should, we believe, be of considerable use since the impact of the Middle East Crisis on American opinion has become a major problem with which American Jews and American Jewish organizations must deal.

We hope this Fact Sheet will enable you to do a great deal to offset harmful propaganda. In particular it should help you be on guard against those who inject anti-Jewish hatred into public and private discussions of the Middle East situation.

You may wish to send copies of "The Middle East Ferment" to strategic people in your community. It is available at 15¢ per copy or $10.00 per hundred.

We will again call the group and find out whether this is a better date. If a good turnout is indicated, we should very much like to have you attend and would be glad to pay $100 towards your travel and other expenses. If you can't come, we would be equally pleased to have George Mitchell.

We would also like to discuss with you if you or George do come up your plans for an investigation of the anti-Semitism among the White Citizens Councils.

Dear George:

I am writing to you to confirm my invitation and to tell you how very happy I am that you will join me on Thursday at 4:30. We are planning to have a small group to consider how our Commission on Community Interrelations can best develop a program which will make a maximum contribution in the South today, and at the same time strengthen the Jewish community to meet the special challenge and threat of the White Citizens Councils. I believe that with your help and that of the social scientists who have agreed to meet we can develop something truly worthwhile. We plan to meet at 4:30 sharp, and will have supper served so that we can continue throughout the evening.

I look forward to seeing you, and am very happy that you will be with us.

The American Jewish Congress is actively considering picking up what load it can in these Southerns. Here's a memo about it.

I gave them encouragement, but put in a stiff proviso that they had to confer frequently with Southern representatives and national representatives of ADL and AJC. The Congress people said such conferences yielded no results. Still I said "you gotta' confer."

I stand by those terms. We should help them if they make it clear that they are trying honestly to work with the other Jewish groups.

(RETURN TO EAB)

PERSPECTIVE AND PROSPECT

Since the advent of the 1954 Supreme Court decision barring segregation in the public schools, it is safe to say that no major religious, communal, and professional groups in the North or the South have achieved unqualified support and acceptance of the requirements imposed upon them by this and other historic decisions affecting segregation. To be sure, reluctance to accept and the evasion of the social and moral consequences of these decisions were, in some measure, anticipated by all those who applauded the Court's wisdom and courage. But informed anticipation and insight do not, of themselves, create program that will guide the Southern community toward the establishment of a just and equitable social order.

In particular, the religious bodies are troubled; their membership cleaved, their leadership and resources dissipated. This is not to deny, however, the efficacy of their present efforts to reformulate policy and organization with respect to the problems of desegregation nor the enormous potential that the Southern religious community may eventually bring to bear on these problems. Some segments of the Christian community appear to be defying and obstructing rational efforts to effect an integrated society; others are troubled by organizational difficulties and the inhibiting influence of a dual morality - one for the South and one for the North.

The problems that desegregation have brought to the white Christian majority in the South are not generally, however, accompanied by those real and alleged fears that tend to be associated with minority status and social insecurity. And this appears to be the case concerning the Southern Jewish community. There are approximately 225,000 Jews living in 11 Southern States (85,000 or one-third in the State of Florida.). Investigation of and reports on the reaction of the Southern Jewish community to the processes of desegregation reveal a growing atmosphere of fear and hysteria. In part, this response can be attributed to the overt anti-Semitism manifested by the White Citizens' Councils and other racist organizations. In addition, there are the persistent rumors of economic boycotts or other reprisals against the Jewish community.

This atmosphere has tended to still the voice of the Southern Jewish community and permit an unproductive conservatism to control both policy and practice. One influential Jewish community council in the South has warned national Jewish organizations that if they persist in overt support of desegregation and the advancement of civil rights, they "will only hurt the cause of the Negro and unleash a wave of anti-Semitism in the South." Needless to say, there is no validity nor morality in these evasive observations. They are primarily the product of frightened and conservative leadership.

It may truthfully be said, however, that the plight of the Southern Jewish community is not lessened by the cleavage and confusion that obtains within the Christian community. There is need, therefore, to strengthen the leadership of all religious and communal organizations toward united policy and program. In this way, opposition to the Citizens' Councils and other irresponsible groups would proceed in concert and not in isolation. Religious and non-religious organizations that are moved to accept some responsibility for meeting the challenge of desegregation will be able to do so on common ground and from a common reservoir of skills and resources.

Toward this end, therefore, it has been suggested that professional personnel, North and South--social scientists, social workers, educators, religious and communal leaders--look toward the establishment of an organizational or advisory body that would serve to amalgamate as well as guide the diverse but potentially influential sources of liberal leadership. Such an advisory body would be able to provide consultative services, research, institutes and workshops, and a communications network for publicizing the availability of a wide range of professional skills and resources. It is assumed that a liberal leadership, armed with rational skills and insights, with the guidance provided by social scientific inquiry, will gain both in morale and stature.

It is understood that this consultative body and such program and resources as it may develop would serve as an adjunct to and not as replacement of those services now being rendered by other types of organizations and agencies. In the interest of efficiency, it should not invade, confuse or duplicate current services or contributions. It is also clear that the development of services, skills, resources and strategies, should be in cooperation with those persons in the South who are familiar with its problems and potentialities.

These introductory observations are suggestive rather than determinative. We need to explore the feasibility as well as the merit of this proposal. We need to discuss the form and type of organization that would best suit our goals and expectations. In addition, we need to review such questions as type of service or resource to be rendered, how they are to be rendered, the necessity of permanent staff and their location. We may also need to reflect on the possibility of future planning and coordinating conferences and of involving a wider range of professional interests and competencies.

The establishment of such an advisory body is going to present numerous difficulties at the initial stage. But its benefits for and contributions to the development of productive social change in the South, intelligently conceived and executed, are incalculable. Nor should we overlook the fact that the creation of such an organization together with the development of an informed and constructive program should be deemed worthy of support.

Mrs. Justine Wise Polier
Acting Chairman

Dear Mrs. Polier:

I feel some uneasiness over spots, particularly on pages four and five, in the account of the New York conference of July 12, 1956, which you so kindly sent me October 2nd.

I have difficulty in putting my finger on this or that couplet of words of what I am reported as having said, which couplet would be erroneous. But it seems to me the account of my few remarks is rather more condemnatory and alarming that I think I was.

I don't really think that Jewish participation in the struggle for integration has been "skimpy." It has been spotty, but everywhere in the South one feels the predominant pressure of the Jewish community for compliance with the Supreme Court's decision. This or that individual may be palpably timid. But as a community, it seems to me Jewish people have been pretty generally on the right side.

I would like to record with you my disagreement with the word "skimpy" (though 'tis one of my words, and I daresay I used it, but I think it has been got a little out of my context). And at the end of my remarks at the top of page five, the first half of the sentence seems to me all right. I worry about "adding that 'when the chips are down there will be bloodshed.'" What I really think is that here and there over the South, as integration proceeds, there will be incidents and occasional outbursts of violence. But I don't expect it at all to be pervasive, and I don't agree in the least that integration will only occur with and after "bloodshed." I guess I was trying to get across that when angry people are out in front, their anger against Jews will be in evidence.

I will be quite content if this letter is merely filed with the National Advisory Committee's Minute Book. No need now to backtrack and attempt alteration of what has gone out.

I praise what the group is in favor of, and continue to stand with you.

Dear George:

I am enclosing the Minutes of the meeting of the National Advisory Committee, Commission on Community Interrelations, convened on July 12, 1956, at the Stephen Wise Congress House.

I believe the Minutes to be a reasonably accurate record of the substance of our deliberations, including stated recommendations directed toward advancing the cause of integration in the South. I do hope, however, that you will feel free to comment on the Minutes.

I should also like to add that certain of the recommendations recorded in the Minutes, namely, those having to do with sponsoring attitude surveys and the establishment of a Southern office, have been expanded and incorporated into a formal request for foundation support. I am also happy to report that since our meeting, Dr. Hager spent a very profitable week at the Highlander Folk School (Monteagle, Tennessee) workshop on integration.

Summary of the July 12th Meeting

The meeting opened with a presentation by Justice Polier reviewing the real and alleged fears of the Southern Jewish community regarding its active involvement in the integration process. Reference was made to the fact that these fears are associated with minority status and feelings of social insecurity and that, in part, these responses can be attributed to the overt anti-Semitism manifested by the White Citizen's Councils and other racist organizations. In addition, there are the persistent rumors of economic boycotts or other reprisals against the Jewish community. It was also pointed out that these concerns contributed to a growing atmosphere of fear, apprehension, and indecision, and that they have tended to still the voice of the southern Jew and permit an outward and unproductive conservatism to control both policy and practice. It was reported, for example, that one influential Jewish community council in the South has warned national Jewish organizations that if they persist in overt support of integration and the advancement of civil rights, they "will only hurt the cause of the Negro and unleash a wave of anti-Semitism in the South."

These conditions do not necessarily present a "Jewish problem." They do however, raise the far broader question of whether we can tolerate the organization of prejudice and hostility against minority groups to prevent their full participation in the moulding of public opinion, their participation in community planning, and their contribution to social change. They also raise the challenging question of what counteraction must be taken so that minority groups shall not be jeopardized or made ineffective in the ongoing struggle to achieve the American ideal. It is essential not only to oppose the growth of racist groups in the South, but to build strength in the Southern community so that all religious and communal groups shall be increasingly effective through cooperative effort in meeting the strategy of the White Citizens Councils to gain support through an appeal to religious as well as racial prejudice.

Judge Polier also reported that in March, 1956, the American Jewish Congress was requested to send a representative to meet with "leaders" of a Southern Jewish community and that, subsequently, first hand reports were secured from Mr. Isaac Toubin, director of the AJCongress and from Mr. Albert Vorspan, who travelled through the South on behalf of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Both reports established that:

1. A substantial proportion of Jews, even in the deep South, feel that discrimination and segregation of the Negro is morally wrong, but that they experience difficulty, under present conditions, in publicly expressing this sentiment.

2. Many Jews of the South do not wish to discuss the problem of desegregation and are, through leadership groups, demanding of national Jewish organizations, that they desist from work in the civil rights field and from all work directed to lessen discrimination against the Negro.

3. Some important national Jewish organizations are yielding to this pressure and are compromising their long established positions by saying one thing in the North and another in the South.

4. While all white citizens who show courage are being subjected to threats of economic and physical reprisal, Jewish citizens feel that they are in an especially exposed position as members of a minority group.

5. Where Jews have led in the struggle for integration, as in New Orleans, this action has been used to incite anti-Semitism as another issue through which White Citizen's Councils can be strengthened. Southern Jews who would like to join the liberal forces for integration feel isolated and unsure of their ability to function.

George Mitchell expressed his disappointment that Jewish participation in the struggle for integration had been "skimpy". He felt that it was important that sound efforts should be made to stiffen the backbone of Jews in the South so that they would make a contribution as Jews to the problem of the South and, at the same time, more actively participate in those general efforts by all citizens of good-will directed to the same goal. He also expressed the opinion that many Southerners were respectful of and would respond to a scientific approach -- such as the data that had been presented indicating that segregation is bad for a child and creates emotional problems for the child on whose behalf segregation is maintained as well as the child against whom it is practiced.

Mr. Mitchell questioned the extent to which "Jewish leaders" in Southern communities truly represented the Jewish community rather than the small group of wealthy old-time residents. He felt it was important to discover what was the real sentiment. He added that although these leaders felt that if they conformed to Southern mores they were safe and would be accepted, he disagreed -- adding that "when the chips are down there will be bloodshed."

Prof. Marie Jahoda reported that SPSSI (Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues) had sent letters to 300 people at universities in the South to inquire whether they felt they needed and wanted help on the problems arising as a result of the conflict over the Supreme Court decision. Seventy-five answers were received most of which were positive and detailed. There was widespread expression of the need for social and scientific material, and for occasional discussion meetings.

Prof. Stuart Cook felt that the time had come to quit talking about the South and the Jews. He stated we need facts about the orientation of the Jewish community. We do not know the proportion of the community that is for, against, or to whom integration is not an important issue. He pointed up the need to be clear on evaluating the noises one hears from the South, the need to know how central to the life of the community is the issue on which conformity is based. How many silently agree or disagree? What potential allies are there in the community? What can or could they do? Such questions need to be answered.

Prof. Cook also felt that in selecting areas for concentrated effort one must differentiate between those states or areas in the South which have moved toward integration, those that have violently resisted, and those that have not moved. He pointed out that when they begin to move they move quickly. He believed that the most strategic use of limited efforts should be directed to those areas or states that had not yet moved in either direction (e.g., Eastern Tennessee).

Prof. Roma Gans spoke of her experience both in the South and in the North with teachers enrolled for graduate work. She spoke with enthusiasm of the possibility of securing the cooperation of those religious groups who could best take leadership at this time. She welcomed the possibility of closer cooperation between the Catholic and Jewish groups that would work toward justice in the South. She expressed concern about the statement of one Southern employer of teachers who had admitted he could not afford to hire Catholics, but that "the Jews had played ball." Prof. Gans also pointed out the lack of information that exists even within a single Southern community where real progress was made. She also cited the integration program in the parochial schools and in the experimental school at Nashville, Tenn. Too few Southerners know what is going on in their own communities.

Mr. Mitchell also commented on the lack of communication between liberal groups in the South. He reported that in Nashville, Tennessee, a letter supporting the Supreme Court decision from a national Jewish organization had led to a series of meetings at the Jewish Community Center which had included the Protestant Council (which had received a similar letter from a national Protestant group), the Negro PTA, the Jewish groups and several others. This had proved to be an effective but unpublicized series of meetings.

Mr. Mitchell stated that left to itself the Southern community, as such, does little. Often someone from afar with a good approach and status can get things going. He spoke of the conflicting forces that were supporting the tyranny of conformity and of those persons and groups who were desirous of breaking through or away from such conformity.

Prof. Dan Dodson expressed the opinion that the sanction of church and national groups might help to provide the status needed and some exemption from the persecution that threatened those Southerners who wished to move forward. He felt that work in this field required "angry men in principle who could also compromise and move wisely."

Mr. Shad Polier stated that in any effort to work with and strengthen the contribution of the Jewish community, it was important to remember that apart from the earlier Spanish and German Jews who had lived in the South for over a century, the majority of Southern Jews had emigrated from Eastern Europe to escape the ghettoes and find freedom in the U.S. in the 1890's, after World War I and following World War II. He felt that a large proportion of this group was widely scattered in the South and had little relation to Jews in other parts of the world. They need help to live in accordance with the moral principles of Judaism and not to accept the unworthy role of ignoring and avoiding the challenge presented by the problems of desegregation. He felt that real service must be rendered to achieve this.

Mr. Isaac Toubin then raised a series of questions:

1. How can we ascertain the true facts concerning the attitudes of the Jews in the South toward integration?

2. What can Jews do to strengthen the liberal forces in the South -- through national organizations, through local groups?

3. Is there truth in the allegation that Jewish support of integration would hurt the Negro?

4. Are pronouncements from the North by national Jewish groups helpful, useless, or hurtful?

In the following discussion Mr. Mitchell expressed the opinion that if Jews would volunteer to help in the work of integration it would be a source of great strength. He also urged that every effort be made to achieve cooperation among all national Jewish groups.

In answer to the question whether pronouncements from the North by national Jewish groups were not hurtful, or at least useless, it was pointed out that Rabbi Charles Mantinband of Hattiesburg, Mississippi, had found that the statement of the American Conference of Reform Rabbis supporting the end of segregation and equal treatment of all human beings to be most helpful to him in his efforts on behalf of integration in the South. Rabbi Mantinband observes the practice of reading this statement when he is questioned regarding his stand favoring integration. In this way he invokes religious sanction for the position he has taken and is able to communicate to others the expression of a moral point of view sadly in need of greater circulation in the South.

Conclusions:

At the end of the conference it was agreed:

1. That a National Advisory Committee to C.C.I. should be enlarged to include all those present and additional persons, including representatives of the Negro community.

2. That a program be developed which would be directed toward shoring up the morale of the Jewish community in the South and of the forces seeking integration. Such a program should be directed to securing maximum support from the Jewish community and to securing maximum participation by Jewish citizens in the wider efforts of the entire Southern liberal movement. Plans should be developed to arrange for conferences between Rabbis in the South and between Rabbis and lay members of the Jewish community who could be involved. Likewise plans needed to be developed for closer cooperation between church and synagogue leaders and between Jewish and lay Christian citizens who would work together.

3. That several surveys should be undertaken to determine the attitudes of the Southern Jewish community regarding integration and the extent to which that community sanctions the statements of those "Jewish leaders" who have demanded that Jews in the South refrain from active support of and participation in the movement toward integration.

4. That methods for closer communication needed to be developed between professionals in different fields (e.g., educators, social scientists, psychiatrists, librarians, ministers) in the North and South so that they could work together, share their knowledge and experiences, so that those in the South would receive supportive help from their colleagues of similar mind in both the South and North. Conferences and seminars with small groups and regional professional meetings could provide a point of departure for this work.

5. That an office be established in the South to be staffed by professional intergroup relations workers. It should be the responsibility of this office to locate, encourage, and strengthen Jewish and non-Jewish sources of liberal sentiment. It should also be prepared to provide services in times of crisis and to reinforce those persons and programs committed to advancing the struggle for integration. It should aid in establishing contact and communication between those persons and groups in the South that desire to increase the effectiveness of the Jewish community as a liberal instrumentality.

6. That a two-year budget be secured for the work and that it be guided as a special project by the National Advisory Committee.

Dear friend:

I am happy to announce the appointment of Mr. Isaac Toubin as executive director of the American Jewish Congress to succeed the late lamented and beloved Dr. David Petegorsky.

Mr. Toubin, who is not unfamiliar to you, has been successively assistant, associate and acting director of the Congress with which he has served for more than ten years. Prior to that he was associated with the National Jewish Welfare Board in a number of executive capacities here and overseas.

A graduate of the Yeshiva College and the Jewish Theological Seminary, he pursued graduate work in economics and history at Columbia University. We know that under his leadership the Congress will continue to render effective service to the Jewish community in the fields of its endeavor.

Dear Mr. Hager:

I am a long time replying to your letter, but I wanted to look into the question you raised with reasonable thoroughness before answering.

You are right in feeling that little has been done to survey racial patterns in welfare services. Enclosed is an excerpt from a report by the Richmond Urban League which has some relevence. No doubt the Urban League could supply the specific names, places and other particulars of the instances referred to in these two paragraphs.

Another report, somewhat out-dated but of possible interest, is "The Employment of Negroes in Public Welfare in Eleven Southern States, 1936 - 1949" by John R. Larkins, Information Bulletin No. 17 of the North Carolina State Board of Public Welfare, July 1951. This is the only thing of its kind that I know of, and unfortunately we have only one copy. But if you will write to Mr. Larkins, I'm sure he would be happy to send you one.

If I come across any more recent research activity in this field I will let you know.

I was glad to get a glimpse of you at the recent meeting in New York though sorry that we didn't get a chance to talk.

Dear Harold:

I do want to congratulate you on the publication of "Integration North and South." It is excellent and I have already put it to good use.

I did want to make inquiry, however, about the status or prospects of desegregation and integration in a category not included in this recent volume, namely, in public welfare and rehabilitative services (mental institutions, orphanages, homes for the aged, reformatories, etc.). Several mohths ago we made a survey of 35 juvenile courts in the nation concerning their employment and assignment policies with respect to probation officers. Eight courts (4 in the South and 4 in the Midwest) reported employing and assigning probation officers on a segregated basis. So far as I know, this type of segregated case-load does not have a statutory base even in Southern jurisdictions. I am aware that social work organizations and other professional welfare groups are addressing themselves to this problem, but I am wondering if any reports or surveys of segregated (or integrated) welfare services have been made or are under way.

Sincerely yours,

Don Hager

HCJ

We have very little information on integration of public welfare workers or recipients. John Larkins issued a bulletin in 1951 entitled "Employment of Negroes In Public Welfare In Eleven Southern States, 1936-1949."

The 1955 report of the Urban League on the "Negro Municipal Worker" covers only 31 cities. It reports six cities employing 32 court workers and eight cities employing 306 workers in Departments of Public Welfare. Apparently, some of the Welfare workers are in non-professional jobs. It is not possible to identify (that is, from the report) the cities having these employees or all of the types of jobs held.

Dear Ed:

My apologies for the fact that this letter will deal with several current matters.

First of all, James Rorty's article on John Kasper is extremely illuminating, and I would be grateful for whatever number of reprints you could let us have.

Secondly, I understand that various Agencies are interested in contributing to subscriptions to the Petal Paper. We can supply up to several thousand southern people who would doubtless welcome a gift subscription. I will look forward to hearing further about the development of this idea.

Finally, and least fruitfully, I have had little luck in finding an appropriate Southern social scientist who would be willing and able to undertake the article for the Scientific American. The ones I know off who are definitely qualified are too busy, and there are very few of those. That doesn't mean that there are no candidates--simply that I haven't been able to find them. However, let me advance the thought that it may not make much difference whether the author of this one is Southern or not. After all, it is a scientific question, and it is a fact that most of the work in this field has been done in the North. I wish I could be more helpful on this, for I would like to see the opportunity seized.

With all good wishes for 1957.

CONFIDENTIAL

Mr. Harold C. Fleming
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
Room 432, 63 Auburn Avenue, N.E.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Harold:

Quite confidentially, we are trying to locate a reputable Southern social psychologist or sociologist who would be willing to undertake the preparation of a quasi popular article answering the McGurk thesis. This article would, hopefully, appear in the Scientific American, with whose editor I have discussed the matter preliminarily. It is our plan to stimulate wide reprinting of such an article preparatory to its distribution throughout the South.

Can you suggest the names of one or two people who would be willing to undertake, initially, the preparation of a two-page outline for the editor of Scientific American? We would appreciate it very much if you would privately inquire among the scholarly fraternity and stimulate the interest of one or two acceptable people.

Could you let me hear from you in the very near future, since time is of the essence.

Warm regards.

Sincerely,

Edwin J. Lukas

Dear Bob:

Many thanks for the copy of the report prepared by a committee of the NAIRO Washington Chapter. I will take care to treat it confidentially.

This is an impressive and useful survey. I'll be interested to learn, in due course, how it is used and with what results.

Our report is evidently getting a wide readership within the new administration -- to what effect remains to be seen.

My best regards.

Dear Harold:

The memorandum to the new President from the Southern Regional Council got extensive treatment from the Washington press. Indeed, the "Post" of February 2, has an editorial (see attached) which leaves me a bit befuddled. But then, the "Post" can get a bit too cute for its own best interests on occasion.

I am rather anxious to read the report which arrived today. I am quite curious to know how it may dovetail with the enclosed report which a study group of NAIRO's Washington Chapter has just completed. I have been the editor of that report, pulling together information supplied by study group members and other sources. I am happily swapping ours for yours, feeling I will come away with far the better of the bargain.

For the present time may I ask this restraint: that the report not be shared with anyone else. It has an internal purpose which I might discuss with you if this were a face-to-face chat. Also, we are concerned that no personal mileage be gotten from our work by those unconnected with the project who might try to peddle it for their own purposes without having contributed to its preparation. I believe you know Washington well enough to appreciate that to which I have reference.

With best personal regards.

Dear Bob:

I am more embarrassed and apologetic than I can say about the goof in our handling of your confidential report. This was entirely the result of my own carelessness. My chagrin is all the greater because this is the kind of mistake that we pride ourselves on not making. I hope that the consequences are as slight as you describe them, and that you can accept my red-faced apologies.

Of course, Les Dunbar will handle the matter as you suggest.

If there is anything else I can do to rectify this mistake, do let me know.

Dear Harold:

I much regret having to take your time to report a somewhat distressing matter. John Yoshino, President's Committee on Government Contracts, called me today somewhat upset because he had received a letter from Mr. Leslie W. Dunbar of your staff requesting a copy of the study done by the survey group of the NAIRO Washington Chapter.

Since Yoshino currently is somewhat insecure at the Committee and since he has not seen a copy of the report as yet, this request left him quite puzzled as to why it came to him. Yoshino will probably tell Mr. Dunbar that he has not seen the report and suggest instead Joe Douglass's 1960 NAIRO conference paper on a somewhat related matter. I hope Dunbar will accept this response and let the matter drop.

This is a minor unfortunate development, and I hope that the two of us can work it out together.

Sincerely,

Bob

STATEMENT OF THE

AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

ON FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

TO THE

SUBCOMMITTEE ON EDUCATION

OF THE

SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

87th CONGRESS - FIRST SESSION

The American Jewish Committee, a national organization with chapters and units in over 50 cities and with membership in over 600 additional communities in the United States, was organized in 1906 and incorporated by a Special Act of the Legislature of the State of New York in 1911. Its Charter states:

> The objects of this corporation shall be, to prevent the infraction of the civil and religious rights of Jews, in any part of the world; to render all lawful assistance and to take appropriate remedial action in the event of threatened or actual invasion or restriction of such rights, or of unfavorable discrimination with respect thereto.

For 54 years, it has been one of the fundamental tenets of the American Jewish Committee that the welfare and security of Jews depend upon the preservation of religious freedom for all Americans, and that discrimination against any religious group in the United States may eventually be a threat to Jews.

Perhaps the major contribution of American political thought to Western civilization has been the concept of the separation of church and state, which was intended to safeguard religious freedom. This political and social philosophy, adopted by the Founding Fathers and written into the Constitution of the United States in the First Amendment is not based upon any hostility to religion, but upon the sound premise that both religion and government can work best to achieve their objectives if each is free from the other within its respective sphere. It has been this theory of relationship between religion and government, between church and state, that has nurtured the healthy development of over 250 different religious groups in the United States, each dependent solely upon the voluntary support of its adherents, and not upon winning political power or receiving contributions from the public treasury. As Mr. Justice Frankfurter said in his concurring opinion in McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203, 232:

> ...We have staked the very existence of our country on the faith that complete separation between the state and religion is best for the state and best for religion....

The American Jewish Committee believes that there is a crisis in education in the United States today and that such crisis will continue into the foreseeable future. The increasing demands of our highly industrialized and highly specialized society, combined with the spectacular increase in birth rate during and following World War II, have contributed to the creation of this crisis. More and better education than ever before are required so that our people may be competent in contemporary society to govern themselves, and also exercise the judgment necessary for their survival in an atomic age.

Because the Federal Government is receiving an ever larger bite of the tax dollar and because the various states have uneven rates of economic development, substantial federal support is, and will continue to be, necessary for all levels of education. The American Jewish Committee, however, believes with President Kennedy that this crisis in education can (and indeed must be) met within the framework of sound public policy adopted over 170 years ago, namely, that the institutions of church and state shall be kept forever separate and distinct in the United States. We, therefore, heartily endorse the Administration's proposal for a three-year program of federal financial assistance for public elementary and secondary schools, while urging that federal funds not be made available either as grants or loans for non-public institutions.

This is not to be interpreted as hostility to such schools. In 1925 the American Jewish Committee defended the right of parents to send their children to parochial schools to receive the type of education that such parents deemed best for their children The great constitutional lawyer, Louis Marshall, then President of the American Jewish Committee, filed an amicus curiae brief in the United States Supreme Court in Pierce v. Society of Sisters of the Holy Name of Jesus and Mary, 268 U.S. 510, defending the right of parents to send their children to private, religiously-oriented schools. That brief, written and filed on behalf of the American Jewish Committee over 35 years ago, reasoned then (as it would today, under like circumstances) that parents who elect to send their children to private schools, must "pay out of their own pockets, and not out of the public treasury, the cost of education received by their children at such schools."

Notwithstanding the very rapid growth of all-day Jewish parochial schools -- there are about 45,000 children attending such schools in the United States -- the American Jewish Committee has steadfastly held to that same position: that public funds should be used for public education and must not be used, either directly or indirectly, to support non-public elementary or secondary schools. We do not believe that it is either discriminatory or unjust to ask parents who voluntarily elect to send thei children to private schools because they prefer the type of education given at such institutions over that offered in the public schools, to pay the entire cost of such private school education. Indeed, we would consider it unfair and discriminatory to ask the general tax-payer to foot the bill, in whole or in part, for such private school education.

Thus, while we believe that in the Everson, McCollum and Zorach cases, the United States Supreme Court has interpreted the establishment clause of the First Amendment as a bar to the use of public funds or credits to support religious schools, as well as other church-related functions, we predicate our opposition in the context of the current legislative proposal on grounds of public policy rather than constitutional law.

Religion has flourished in this country, although religious indoctrination has not been subsidized from the public treasury. And the public schools themselves have served as a great unifying force in American life -- welcoming young people of every creed, emphasizing the common heritage of all and serving as training grounds for healthful community living. The public schools have performed an indispensable function, and any departure from experience and tradition which would use public funds to encourage the expansion of parochial school systems would tend to accelerate the public school crisis rather than solve it. Proliferation of parochial school systems by the various religious groups in the United States would result in a fragmentation of American life along religious lines.

Any proposal which would prevent the public schools from fulfilling their traditional role as a unifying force in American life must be weighed with the greatest caution.

Respectfully submitted,

Herbert B. Ehrmann
President

SUBJECT: NOW

I would like to report some developments on NOW so that you will have them for your records.

Nurses Training -- There is a nurses shortage down here and few of the hospitals so far as we have been able to ascertain employ Negro nurses. Nurses training is also not available to Negroes and so NOW has undertaken the project of training to establish some more adequate nurses training for Negro applicants and to persuade the hospitals in the area to employ those qualified Negro nurses available.

Earlington Heights -- The next major school desegregation in Dade County is scheduled to take place in Earlington Heights, which is a transitional neighborhood. NOW, in the persons of Bea Muskat and Pat Sonen, has met with Superintendent Joe Hall to discuss this development. Friday, March 24th, there was a discussion of the Earlington Heights situation and the decision was made that there be an intensive effort made by NOW in cooperation with the existing agencies to try to keep the Earlington Heights area from going all black. It became pretty obvious that this low income neighborhood has already lost many of the white people and others are departing in great numbers. The problem is really one of trying to convince those remaining that it is good to live in an integrated neighborhood. With a White Citizens Council headquarters nearby this will be no mean feat.

The most disturbing item I have to report is that despite the experience of other communities, which experience has proved it is essential to prepare a community, the Dade Superintendent, Joe Hall, has indicated to Bea and Pat that the School Administration welcomes the help of NOW but does not feel it is the Administration's job to assist in this effort except by way of providing information.

I find the above extremely disturbing and it was compounded by the fact that the Superintendent withdrew participation of one of the Assistant Superintendents from the NOW meeting with Mrs. Tilly scheduled on February 24th because the newspaper had tagged the Tilly meeting as one being sponsored by an integrated unit. The Superintendent said that he had received many adverse telephone calls, that the meeting had been misrepresented to him, and that the School Board attorneys had advised him to have no official member of the School Board participate in the meeting less there be difficulty later. This is the kind of situation with which we have to contend at all political levels in this community. It is short-sighted and negative in its approach on the part of public officials which had compounded the difficulties of really doing something about preparing the community to meet its problems.

I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this memo to Harold Fleming at the Southern Regional Council so that he will have this information about Miami but at the same time I am asking that he keep it confidential. There is much more to report but in the interim I think this will give you a partial picture. We still have the problem of raising $9,800.00 and this is going to be a very time consuming and back-breaking job.

Dear Mr. Polier:

This time we are enclosing the July-August New South and our Freedom Riders report of last May. I am enclosing also a special report we did in September in which we attempted to recapitulate the score on the sit-in movement; you may find this of value as reference. I am including also our September New South, feeling that you might enjoy Margaret Long's little essay on page two.

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

My apologies for this very belated acknowledgment of your letter of October 10. Somehow it was mislaid. Even more regrettably, the July-August issue of New South and the additional copy of your Special Report never reached me. I do hope that you can spare copies of both.

I am certain that you will understand that both the writing of my weekly newsletter and the reading of the material from which it is extracted are done under great pressure of time since they must be fitted into a rather heavy schedule of private practice and a great many outside interests. As a matter of fact, I count myself lucky when I have more than two hours in which to dictate the letter, edit it and send it by messenger to the American Jewish Congress for mimeographing.

It may well be that in my haste I misread your comments on the Freedom Riders as being critical of them because they were non-Southerners. On the other hand, if my memory serves me right, there was missing from your Special Report an affirmative recognition of the validity and importance of outsiders coming into the South to help break down barriers of segregation. Be that as it may, I am convinced that the Freedom Riders made a tremendous contribution and I doubt that the Federal Government would otherwise have intervened so promptly and forcefully.

I do hope that whenever your plans bring you to New York you will let me know in advance. While I would be delighted to have lunch with you, it would be an even greater pleasure if you would come to dinner with Judge Polier and myself.

With warmest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Mr. Polier:

It has been some weeks since I read the July 7 newsletter of the American Jewish Congress, in which you commented on our Freedom Ride report. I should have responded before this.

We do have some difference of opinion, but not, I think, as great as you may believe. When we differentiated between the Ride and the earlier sit-ins in point of participation by non-Southerners we were, we thought, just reporting a fact, and not necessarily, as you infer, making a criticism.

I have had and do have some misgivings about the Freedom Ride. I believe, however, that our report of last May, read in its entirety, does give a balanced as well as a basically sympathetic interpretation. We returned again to the subject in our July-August New South, of which I am enclosing a copy, together with an additional copy of the Special Report.

I have no definite plans for being in New York, though I am sure that later this fall I shall be up. Sometime when I am in the city I hope that there may be an opportunity to meet you, perhaps for a lunch. And, of course, if you are ever in Atlanta we want you to visit us.

Dear Colleague:

Mississippi continues to be a focal point in the struggle for civil rights in the South. Consequently a large part of this letter will be devoted to recent developments in that State.

Freedom Riders. The Jackson, Mississippi Police Court continues to hand out sentences to whites and Negroes coming there to defy segregation in bus and railroad terminals. The arrests have now reached the figure of 177, of whom 170 have been convicted on breach-of-the-peace charges since late in May.

The continuation of this form of protest against clearly illegal segregation laws is understandable and, in my opinion, entirely commendable. Indeed, it was disappointing that the Southern Regional Council recently chose to issue a statement critical of the Freedom Riders on the ground that they were mostly "outsiders". The Council sought to differentiate on this ground between the Freedom Riders and Southern students who have provided the manpower for sit-in demonstrations at lunch counters.

To attempt to make such a distinction seems to me to be utterly unsound. The right which the Freedom Riders are seeking to vindicate is the right to travel in interstate commerce without discrimination or segregation. This right is one which belongs not only to those who live in Jackson, Mississippi or, indeed, in any of the Southern States, but also to every person in this country. If there were any logic in the criticism by the Council, one would suppose that the Council would refrain from accepting contributions from individuals and foundations located north of the Mason-Dixon Line, which provide a very substantial part of the funds necessary for the Council to carry on its work in the South.

It is also disappointing that none of the Freedom Riders appear to have appealed the convictions so as to secure a ruling by the United States Supreme Court. It would seem that at least some of those who have chosen to avoid prison by paying their fines would, instead, have posted bond and have taken such an appeal. It is understandable, therefore, that Thurgood Marshall, Chief NAACP Counsel, lamented in a recent address before the 18th Annual Race Relations Institute at Fisk University upon the lack of planning and coordination on the legal front in Jackson.

While no appeals appear to have been taken by the Freedom Riders, one of them did seek to obtain her release by way of a habeas corpus proceeding in the United States District Court. It was to be expected that United States District Judge Sidney Mize should dismiss the application. It is well settled that the validity of such a conviction cannot be tested in a collateral proceeding but must be attacked by direct appeal. Nevertheless, Judge Mize went out of his way in his decision on Monday to commend the use of the Mississippi breach of-the-peace statute as having prevented the occurrence of bloodshed. These observations on the part of Judge Mize were both unnecessary and unsound.

Parks Are For White People. The color line in Jackson is by no means limited to bus and railroad stations. On Wednesday four Negroes were arrested on charges of breach of the peace because they refused to obey police orders to move from a bench in the City park usually used by white persons. Those arrested were among a dozen Negroes who entered the area normally used by white persons as picnickers. Afterwards they strolled around the swimming pool area where they were turned away from the ticket booth. Apparently four of them went too far when they chose to sit down.

Negroes Cannot Vote. Yesterday the Department of Justice filed two suits in Mississippi charging that Negroes had been denied voting rights in two counties. In Forest County, a majority of the 22,000 eligible white persons are registered to vote but only 25 of the 7,495 Negroes. While a substantial majority of the 6,000 white persons of voting age in Clarke County are registered, not one of the Negro residents is registered. This situation, the Justice Department asserts, is a result of a "clear-cut pattern of discrimination", which takes the form of applying different and more stringent standards to Negro applicants, refusing to register Negroes with qualifications similar to those of registered whites and arbitrarily denying Negroes the chance to register.

Both suits were brought in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi and seek temporary and permanent injunctions against discrimination. August 7 has been set for a hearing. Gov. Ross Barnett, to the surprise of no one, immediately denounced the suits as "an invasion of local self-government". Similar suits, also brought under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 against voting registrars, are pending in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Tennessee.

Welfare a la Newburgh. My last letter reported the promulgation of a plan by Newburgh, New York, to deny public assistance to needy children on the grounds of illegitimacy and/or because their homes are "unsuitable". It was noted that the majority of the children affected are Negro.

Yesterday a Subcommittee of the New York Social Welfare Board conducting a public hearing on the Newburgh Plan, found it to be violative both of the State's Aid to Dependent Children Program and the Federal Social Security Act. Under the latter legislation, Federal funds cover 47.6% of the cost and the Federal contribution, in 1960, amounted to $65,569,000. There is no doubt that the full Board will uphold the findings of the Subcommittee.

Newburgh officials have, however, indicated that they will defy the Board's ruling. Three alternatives have been suggested for dealing with such defiance.

Under the first proposal, the State would withhold its contribution of 50% of the cost of the local welfare program. Such action would, in my opinion, create a situation where the remedy would be worse than the disease. It would mean even greater deprivation to the children in Newburgh who need public assistance.

The second proposal is for the Board to seek court action to enjoin the Newburgh Plan now scheduled to go into effect on July 15. Unless a preliminary injunction were granted immediately, this course might well involve delay of days and even weeks while needy children were denied assistance.

A third suggestion has been proposed by Louise Wise Services upon my recommendation as its Counsel. Louise Wise Services is a social agency which for the past 45 years has provided not only child adoption services but also shelter care for hundreds of unmarried mothers each year. It has urged that Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller invoke his powers as the Chief Executive of the State and notify the public officials of Newburgh that their defiance of the decision of the Board will result in the removal of those officials from public office.

In its telegram to the Board and to the Governor, Louise Wise Services urged that the Newburgh Plan violates every precept of child welfare and denounced as utterly unsound the notion that the denial of aid to dependent children is a constructive way to deal with the social phenomenon of illegitimacy. This problem, Louise Wise Services pointed out, is by no means limited to any particular economic, social, religious or ethnic group in the population. That a very high proportion of those seeking public assistance in Newburgh are Negroes is, as noted in my last letter, a natural consequence of, among other things, the lower economic status of the Negro in the community.

Discrimination Against Muslims. Prisoners sentenced by the courts of the District of Columbia are sent to the United States Reformatory at Lorton, Virginia. Thirty-eight inmates are Negroes professing Islam and are known as Muslims. They brought suit in the United States District Court charging discriminations and deprivations because of their religion. They claimed, among other things, that they were deprived of institutional privileges, including medical attention, kept in isolation, required to sleep on concrete floors, provided with little to eat and "forbidden to wear medals symbolic of their faith, although that privilege is accorded to Catholics, Baptists, etc." In addition, their complaint charges that they were denied an opportunity to communicate with their religious advisers, recite their prayers, or receive desired publications without fear of being persecuted. Efforts to obtain redress from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, which has general supervision over the Superintendent of the Prison, were, they asserted, frustrated by the persistent refusal of the Superintendent and other prison officers to transmit any complaints.

The District Court granted the Government motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the judicial branch of the Government should not interfere with the executive function involved in the maintenance of discipline in the prison. Accordingly, the only question before the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, to which the case was appealed, was whether the complaint alleged facts which, if proved, required judicial intervention and whether, therefore, the complainants were entitled to a hearing. The Court of Appeals unanimously reversed in an opinion written by Chief Judge Simon Sobeloff. He pointed out that "It is beyond dispute that certain rights and privileges of citizenship are withdrawn from prisoners, but it has never been held that upon entering a prison one is entirely bereft of all of his civil rights and forfeits every protection of the law." In answer to the argument that if a hearing is ordered in this instance it will encourage a flood of such complaints, Judge Sobeloff said, "Our answer must be the same as that given by the Second Circuit: 'We must not play fast and loose with basic constitutional rights in the interest of administrative efficiency.'"

Movie Censorship in Chicago. Last January, the United States Supreme Court, in a 5-to-4 decision, upheld the constitutionality of the Chicago Censorship Ordinance, which makes it unlawful to show a movie without a permit from the Police Commissioner. In the Times Film case, the exhibitor paid a license fee but refused to submit the film "Don Juan" for examination. When the license was refused, the exhibitor sought an injunction on the ground that censorship constituted, in and of itself, an infringement of the freedom of expression protected by the Constitution.

Last month the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in the Zenith case had before it a situation in which the Police Commissioner and his Sergeant in charge of the Police Censor Board refused to license "The Lovers" unless the entire fifth reel was expunged. The exhibitor was simply told that this reel was immoral and obscene. As a matter of fact, the only group that saw the entire film was the Film Review Board, a group appointed by the Police Commissioner as his advisers.

The Court of Appeals reversed on the ground that the Times Film decision does not provide carte blanche authorization for unfair, arbitrary municipal licensing procedures. It ruled that, under the standards set down by the Supreme Court in the Roth case involving alleged pornographic literature, "It is as a whole that a work must be judged, not merely by plucking isolated scenes or passages from such work." The Court of Appeals also cited the Roth case as having "set the criterion for obscenity, not at an individual, subjective level, but at the benchmark of a general objective determination whether a work appeals to the pruriant interest of the community at large." Consequently, the Court ruled the action of the Police Commissioner was invalid because he, the only responsible official, had never seen the entire film and had not granted the exhibitor an opportunity at a formal hearing to offer evidence to show that the film did not offend against contemporary community standards.

It will be interesting to observe the results of the Zenith decision. Certainly it will be quite a novel experience to observe the Police Commissioner of the City of Chicago conducting his censorship activities in such a way to meet the requirements of due process of law. Nevertheless, it must be said that the entire notion that movies should be subject to censorship marks an irrational and indefensible exception to the freedoms granted by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

Sincerely yours, Abe Fortas

PROPOSAL FOR
A HALL OF HUMAN RELATIONS
IN THE 1964 WORLD'S FAIR

Memorandum submitted to The Honorable Robert Moses

Institute of Human Relations

New York City

Amplification of Initial Presentation

PROPOSAL FOR
IN THE 1964 WORLD'S FAIR

The official keynote of the 1964 World's Fair is "Man's Achievements in an Expanding Universe." It may be safely assumed that many facets of this theme will be fully developed by American industry. Our achievements in breaking through the barriers that stand between man and his knowledge of the physical universe will doubtless be depicted; likewise the best that free enterprise has accomplished in enhancing standards of living.

Yet no less essential to man's well-being is the break-through to new understanding of his fellow man.

To accomplish this break-through is a goal that Americans in ever-increasing number are setting for themselves. Through their voluntary groups, they are working as never before to strengthen human relations and uphold human rights.

Undertakings to these ends range from social research to social action -- psychological exploration into the nature of group prejudice; human-relations education in the schools; measures extending equal opportunity on an unprecedented scale in housing, education, employment and other areas. Activity has been especially marked in interreligious relationships. The United States has become the bastion of the three

Western faiths -- Protestantism, Catholicism and Judaism -- and is today the most believing of all countries. Necessary bridges of understanding between these great religions are being built daily.

The proliferation of voluntary groups is a feature of American life frequently noted by visitors from abroad. Less often perceived is the manner in which these diverse groups are exercising freedom of initiative and association, utilizing the democratic processes of law and citizen action to advance man's understanding of his fellow man.

This accurate, affirmative image of America should be brought into full view. Too much of the negative side of our national life has been pictured.

The possibilities for dramatic visual treatment are vast. Thanks to the remarkable upsurge of concern with interreligious, intercultural and interracial relations on the part of the mass communications media -- radio, television, stage, screen, newspapers and magazines -- there is a reservoir of material at hand. The best motion pictures, plays and TV shows in which situations or characters involving intergroup relations are constructively treated could be shown. All types of special events, including original orchestral, operatic and theatrical performances with human-relations content, could be planned.

The indirect benefits should not be overlooked. The fact that an island of human study is found in a sea of physical accomplishment will elicit press and TV coverage. Visitors will be present from all parts of the world. America's international relations will be aided by an exhibit which stresses personal and intergroup understanding rather than technological accomplishment -- which shows Americans applying themselves to man's inner need for dignity, recognition and fellowship.

Emphases

Suggestive of the concepts to be highlighted by exhibits and special events are the following:

(1) The people who compose our "one nation indivisible" stem from 60 national origins, adhere to more than 200 religious sects and contain all the races of mankind. With freedom to retain and strengthen the unique features of its own heritage, each group contributes to our rich and variegated culture.

Through their own exhibits, participating groups can demonstrate their individual cultural and artistic contributions; their individual approaches to religious faith -- which, despite their differences are grounded in a common ethic.

(2) America was fashioned by freedom-seekers, explorers, pioneers and adventurers who came here from every part of the world and built a nation.

Displays would depict the waves of immigration which made possible the great westward movement, the building of the railroads, expansion of our cities, development of our great universities and centers of scientific thought.

(3) America has always stood as a world-wide symbol of equal opportunity -- a land where each citizen is judged on his merits and may rise to the limit of his individual capacities.

Visual treatment would show our determined march toward equality of opportunity -- in employment, education, housing and other fields. Great human-rights milestones on this continent, dating back to the Mayflower Compact, would highlight our consistent belief in individual dignity as the essence of democracy. An exhibit tracing the religious roots of the Declaration of Independence could be based on interesting research material which the National Council of Churches has in hand.

(4) Our nation's schools strive to keep pace with an ever-changing, ever-shrinking world. Youngsters must understand and appreciate their democratic heritage. They must be prepared to discharge the responsibilities of citizenship and exercise its privileges. They must recognize the growing interdependence of people everywhere. To meet these new demands, our children must be equipped not only with the basic 3 R's but also with 3 new ones -- Rights, Responsibilities and human Relationships. (The U.S. Office of Education developed these thoughts in a challenging little picture book entitled "The Six R's.")

In line with this emphasis, parent groups, teacher organizations, adult education associations and the youth-serving agencies -- Scouts, "Y's," and scores of others -- would demonstrate their programs to further education for modern needs.

(5) Age-old superstitions and stereotypes have stood in the way of better understanding among peoples of different backgrounds. Today, these old myths are yielding to new knowledge and understanding.

The contributions of the mass media should be stressed here. Motion pictures, radio and television, magazines, newspapers and comic books have helped to eradicate stereotypes and build positive images of America and Americans.

(6) Explorations into the psychological roots of bigotry have opened up new approaches to mental health. The social sciences, by developing new insights into the factors that make for healthy personality development, are helping home, school and community to foster outgoing, well-adjusted youngsters, free of the inner conflicts, frustrations and self-deceptions upon which bigotry breeds.

Exhibits would translate recent scientific findings into practical guideposts for the parent, the teacher, the youth worker, the minister and others concerned with mental health and community betterment.

(7) One of the strongest defenses of the free world is public awareness that racial and religious prejudices are incited and manipulated by political power-seekers to undermine free institutions. "Divide and Conquer," typified in modern times by the power drives of nazism, fascism and communism, dates back to antiquity. Demagogues throughout history have played on popular superstitions and fears, deflecting the justifiable grievances of the people to convenient scapegoats.

Even in the United States, rabblerousers have tried to copy this technique from time to time. But their efforts have been rejected by the overwhelming majority of Americans.

A variety of dramatic exhibits, reaching back to the Greeks and down to the present, can illustrate the exploitation of bigotry as a divisive technique.

(8) If our Western culture is to survive in the nuclear age, the science of human relations must catch up quickly with the physical sciences.

Many organizations can demonstrate the various ways in which they are devoting themselves to this task -- through leadership-training workshops; projects to eradicate prejudicial references in religious textbooks; dissemination of information about the beliefs, traditions and practices of different religious and ethnic groups; social-action programs requiring cross-section citizen participation in community improvement and civic affairs.

Nature of Exhibits

It is believed that a properly constituted advisory committee of creative experts could devise a wealth of engrossing exhibits. The following examples are merely illustrative.

(1) The Ames Exhibit at Princeton is a fascinating display of optical illusions in which the visitor sees not what is present but what his past experience has led him to expect. One view produces the illusion and the next view displays the reality. Such an exhibit would demonstrate how people are influenced by their predispositions and result in a warning against the dangers of preconception.

(2) Dioramas could contrast the attitudes based on age-old superstitions and fears relating to race, religion and nationality with the more civilized viewpoints resulting from appreciation of scientific truth. These exhibits could also show what wholesome human relations mean in practical terms, in broadening horizons of individual and group achievement.

(4) Anthropologists have shown us how naked savage boys with bones through their nostrils have been converted into automobile mechanics. Photographic exhibits, perhaps with the actual presence of "live" examples, would indicate the danger of regarding races and peoples as basically inferior.

(5) Visitors could be supplied with simple questionnaires on personality factors and with sensitizing pencils for checking the answers. These questionnaires, when inserted in machines, produce instantaneous personality diagnoses adapted to the various combinations of answers. An effort would be made to couch the diagnoses in hopeful terms, stressing affirmative factors and areas of self-improvement.

(6) Lie detectors have been perfected to the point where a person is asked to mentally select a number between one and ten, and to answer "no" in sequence to the questions "Is it one, is it two, is it three?" and so on. Automatic machinery would indicate the number which had actually been selected, illustrating, among other things, the psychosomatic factors involved.

Setting

Thinking in terms of a suitable framework, something like a "Hall of Human Relations" comes to mind. The name, in any event, should be sufficiently definitive to exclude such tangential subject matter as employer-employee relations, safety drives, health campaigns and the whole gamut of community services that come under the heading of philanthropy -- all extremely important, to be sure, but not integral to the central theme as here envisioned: "Toward Man's Understanding of His Fellow Man."

Structure

In the event that the Federal Government should allocate a building at the Fair for this purpose, there is no doubt that the Institute of Human Relations and other national organizations representing the major religious, racial and ethnic groups in America, as well as leading agencies in education, social science, civil rights, civil liberties and mass communications, would gladly participate and assume responsibility for their own exhibits.

In order to coordinate these efforts, it would seem advisable to create a small Steering Committee broadly representative of all America through the major national organizations in the fields indicated above. A much larger Council of Participating Organizations should reflect the variegated spectrum of group life in America -- the many small religious groups, as well as the three major faiths; native-born Spanish-speaking minorities, as well as the myriad other nation-origin groups; the American Indians and other distinct racial groups, as well as the American Negroes; Hawaiians, Alaskans and other nationally and racially mixed strains in our country.

It would also be desirable to name an Advisory Board of experts in education, the social sciences and mass communications -- persons who are contributing to the development of new insights and their application in dealing with intergroup conflicts. This body might include, among others, representatives of organizations whose concerns cross racial, ethnic and religious lines -- the National Education Association the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues; the Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry; the National Academy of Television Arts and Sciences; the American Society of Newspaper Editors; the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences; university human relations centers in various parts of the country; the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials; education and anti-discrimination departments of the major labor unions.

All the exhibits and special events should be coordinated by a director and staff who would work with the participating organizations to insure that all are enabled to express their programs and philosophies in their own ways, yet cued to the overall purpose of depicting the many trails blazed by a democratic people in advancing man's understanding of his fellow man.

"THOUGHTS ON EXTREMISM"

This reprint (enclosed) from The Catholic News, New York archdiocesan weekly, is a valuable addition to our educational materials on the radical right.

It cites conservative criticism of the extremists, refutes the alleged endorsement by Cardinal Cushing of the Birch Society and suggests guidelines for sound anti-Communist effort.

Inexpensive in cost (5¢ each, $1.50 per hundred), the reprint is suited for distribution in the many thousands to Catholics, in view of source and emphasis; to any other groups as well. Also recommended is distribution to editors of all types of bulletins, weeklies and dailies, who may be interested in applying for permission to reprint in their columns.

FOR RELEASE THURSDAY, SEPT. 27

New York, Sept. 26... The American Jewish Committee today urged its membership to aid in the program to rebuild churches burned in the South. The Agency also called for concrete and moral support for the voter registration campaign, an educational program aimed at inducing southerners -- both white and Negro -- to register and vote in elections.

Characterizing the church burnings as "a barbaric act that offends the civilized conscience," Committee President A.M. Sonnabend paid tribute to the "peaceful and non-violent" response of the Negro people in their struggle to attain "full participation in American democracy."

Founded in 1906, the American Jewish Committee is a pioneer human relations agency in this country, combating bigotry, protecting the civil and religious rights of Jews here and abroad, and advancing the cause of human rights for all.

Mr. Sonnabend asserted that those "who have sought to terrorize our Negro fellow citizens into abandoning the path that leads to their full participation in American democracy, have achieved the very opposite effect." He added:

"They have stiffened the resolve of Negroes to attain their civil and political equality and they have strengthened the solidarity of all Americans in supporting every legal and moral step toward this objective."

The Committee President said that to combat "this form of desecration, which men of conscience everywhere must consider blasphemy," representatives of national Catholic, Protestant and Jewish communities have consulted and decided to appeal to all Americans to participate in the rebuilding of the churches.

Thus, all Americans may have the opportunity, Mr. Sonnabend said, to support "the stalwart response of Negro leaders which has evoked widespread admiration." He said of the Negro leaders that "their resolve to overcome in peaceful and non-violent ways every obstacle that stands in the way of full emancipation is stamped with Biblical and Prophetic spirit and dignity." He added: "To many Jews, this struggle evokes ancient memories of the deliverance out of bondage, and strengthens our identification with this present struggle for human dignity."

Subject: Summary and Analysis of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Decisions of the 1961-62 Term of the Supreme Court

We enclose herewith the sixth in our annual series of Summaries and Analyses of the decisions of the Supreme Court handed down during the 1961-62 Term in the field of civil rights and civil liberties.

Despite a drop in the number of decisions in this area from the heavy load of the previous Term (28 as compared with 54), there was no striking change in the nature of the Court's activity. It is still true that, as noted last year, the Supreme Court of recent years has been the principal guardian of the liberties of the people, rather than, as it was during the first 150 years of its existence, the principal protector of property rights. It is also still true that the Court is sharply divided on many of the issues covered in this report. Previous years have seen a sharp division of the Court into a conservative bloc of five and a liberal bloc of four. This division was slightly blurred during the past year by the retirement of Justice Whittaker and the illness during most of the Term of Justice Frankfurter. Nevertheless, the Justices participating in the various cases adhered to their previous voting patterns. It is, of course, too early to determine how the replacement of Justices Whittaker and Frankfurter by Justices White and Goldberg will affect the close balance within the Court.

We trust you will find this Summary and Analysis interesting and useful.

Les,

Wittenstein called and says that the following is a gist of what he has. If you want more information, call him or if you want copies of these things, he'll furnish you with them:

Wittenstein has a memorandum from Harry Fleischman which says that the UAW has not yet made a final decision to go ahead with the film project. The film is to be a documentary on the defeat of Georgia Congressman James C. Davis. The film would illustrate the close cooperation between Negroes in the labor movement in this election to bring about a victory.

Wittenstein has copy of a letter written by Joel O'Brien Productions, Inc. of New York to Carroll Hutton, Director of Education, UAW, Detroit. This letter states "the VEP has fallen quite a bit short of the goals set for it." It also makes the point that the Atlanta Story (the film) would be a perfect vehicle to drive home the reasons for Negroes to vote and the importance of one (1) vote. "UAW, Local #34 was involved in this fight (meaning the Weltner-Davis fight). The vote of the Negro precincts in Atlanta was enough to provide the vote for Weltner."

The budget for such a film should be in the neighborhood of $30,000. It would be filmed on location (Atlanta).

The film has been discussed with Lloyd Garrison and with Julius Thomas (recently retired Industrial Relations Secretary of the NUL). Garrison feels that if UAW could come up with half of the budget, he could raise the other half from such sources as Taconic, James Farmer of CORE said that he "would put such a film to good use as could the Urban League, the NAACP, the SRC, and the VEP, which do not have enough money for important visual aids of this kind.

SPEECH AT ANNUAL DINNER MEETING, ATLANTA CHAPTER, AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 17, 1963, BY CHARLES F. WITTENSTEIN
SOUTHEAST AREA DIRECTOR

There was a time when we in Atlanta could talk of little but race relations. That time has passed, but for the region as a whole, race re[illegible] the central issue. But the way in which that issue is formulated has chang[illegible] no longer wonder "whether or not", but we ask "how" and "when". I w[illegible] to [illegible]ss myself briefly tonight to the question of "how" -- the question of [illegible] -- because the way in which change is brought about profoundly affect[illegible] nature of change itself.

The growing importance of tactics is hi[illegible]ted by the controversy which has grown among predominately Negro civil [illegible]ups. Several years ago it was inconceivable to us that [illegible]der attack as being insufficiently [illegible] [illegible]en [illegible] defensive in the Negro community in a major dispute centering almost exclusively on tactics.

The three most important tactical approaches which have been and will continue to be used in the South are direct action, litigation and negotiation.

By direct action I mean the use of boycott, picketing, public prayer meetings and other forms of mass demonstrations. It has achieved greatest success primarily in lunch counter desegregation. Its secondary value lies in exposing the continuing existence of segregation, e.g., as the freedom rides spotlighted segregation in interstate bus travel and prompted a new ruling by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Litigation has been most notably successful in desegregating educational institutions and other publicly owned facilities such as parks, or businesses holding franchises from the public such as buses. It has been of little or no use in desegregating facilities operated by private companies where the barriers are not the result of state action.

Negotiation on the other hand has been effective primarily in desegregating privately owned and operated facilities, opening new job opportunities for Negroes, or getting additional Negroes appointed to public boards and agencies. It is available as a tactic only where the atmosphere is relatively calm, where lines of communication between the races are open, and positions have not hardened to the point where give and take is not possible on both sides. Negotiation requires responsible Negro and White leadership (which is not universally available), also careful preparation. Neither negotiation or picketing would have ever gotten James Meredith in Ole Miss. Sometimes negotiation has been effective only when combined with direct action or litigation, or when there is the threat that such other tactics may be used.

If lunch counter desegregation represents the high water mark of direct action by the use of picketing and boycotting, [illegible] Albany, Ga., represents its low water mark -- indeed, its most dismal failure. We have seen an enormous amount of time, suffering, money and sacrifice expended in an effort which has, to this day, failed to desegregate anything whatsoever. All it has succeeded in doing is to create bitterness locally and embarrassment for the United States internationally. The explanation for the failure is the lack of clear thinking about tactics.

I would liken the city fathers of Albany to the Pharaoh in Egypt. Their hearts were hardened and no demonstration could persuade them to modify their policy of massive resistance. This situation was ideally suited for neither direct action or negotiation but for litigation. Finally, a suit was filed by the NAACP -- and it will be this suit (or one like it) that will eventually bring desegregation to Albany, not Martin Luther King, not the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, and not the courageous but futile demonstrations by Negroes of the Albany movement, or their visiting northern supporters. I say this notwithstanding the recent decision by Federal District Judge Elliott.

While litigation is in certain cases more effective than mass demonstrations, and certainly involves less danger of creating chaos in the process of effecting social change, the best hope of lasting progress lies in calm negotiation. For this proposition, I would cite the remarkable achievements of Macon and Brunswick, Ga., and the very quiet but effective work done in both cities by the Georgia Council on Human Relations, whose Executive Director, Mrs. William Pauley is here tonight.

One of the most striking contrasts between Albany, Ga., and Oxford, Miss., is the massive federal intervention in the one situation and the almost total absence of federal support in the other. The explanation for this is clear. In Oxford the Administration had a handle -- the court order directing the admission of James Meredith to Ole Miss. In Albany, rightly or wrongly, the Administration never found a handle for intervention, despite its embarrassment.

Albany is also noteable for its ultimate refinement of the Jackson, Miss., approach -- put anyone in jail who publicly demonstrates against jim crow. Police pursuing this approach can certainly never be accused of a morbid pre-occupation with the First Amendment. While many civil rights issues have already been resolved, one which will be subject to further and protracted argument is the right or duty of the Federal Government to actively protect its citizens in the exercise of freedom of speech and assembly against police infringement.

My purpose in all of this is to indicate the variety of tactics available to effect social change and the absolute necessity of choosing the one that is most effective under the surrounding circumstances. In matters of principle we may and sometimes should be dogmatic. In matters of tactics we must always be flexible, and we must always be guided by the test of effectiveness. If the regional operation of the American Jewish Committee has achieved a degree of support among thoughtful Jewish leadership in the South, I am inclined to attribute it to the kind of tactical sensitivity which I have described.

In the process of discussing tactics, I have at the same time reviewed some of the major Southern developments in the field of inter-group relations during the recent past. I want to touch briefly on one other less sensational but quite important turn of events.

Our sister State Alabama is as much if not more committed to massive resistance today as it was a year ago. But while the official policy remains one of defiance, an undercurrent of sentiment for compliance has appeared, especially in Birmingham and Mobile. It may be too little and too late, but it is encouraging. I am particularly pleased with the increasing willingness of our constituency to involve themselves constructively in the process.

As I look toward the year ahead, and focus now on Atlanta, it seems to me that one of our major tasks should be directed to translating the Chicago Conference on Religion and Race into meaningful terms on the local level. Our distinguished guest of this evening (His Excellency, Paul J. Hallinan, Archbishop of Atlanta) played a leading role in this first tri-faith conference which mobilized the moral forces of Catholicism, Protestantism and Judaism on a national level. At a meeting I attended last week he pledged his full support to a counterpart effort in Atlanta. It is my sincere hope that this Chapter of the American Jewish Committee will participate with our Catholic and Protestant friends in a cooperative effort to apply our common moral heritage to the pressing problems of human relations in our time and in this place.

Dear Friend:

This issue marks the beginning of the sixth year of publication of my newsletter reporting and analyzing developments in civil rights and civil liberties in the United States. It is being written today because the offices of AJCongress will be closed the latter part of the week for the Jewish New Year. I take this opportunity of expressing to my readers best wishes for the coming year.

The Southern Scene. Yesterday a dynamite bomb thrown into a Negro church in Birmingham took the lives of four children and wounded 20 others. It marked the 21st time in the last eight years that Negroes in that city have been the victims of such an attack. Although until yesterday no lives had been taken by any of the previous bombings, this was a matter of sheer chance. During that period the arrests have been few and the only persons charged with acts of terrorism were a group of white men captured a few years ago by Negro guards. They testified that the men had been seized after throwing a bomb at the church of which Rev. Fred L. Shuttleworth -- a leading figure in the struggle against segregation-- was the minister. They were acquitted.

Terror in Birmingham is therefore nothing new. It is as old as the declarations of defiance uttered by political leaders in opposition to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court declaring that segregation by force of law violates the Fourteenth Amendment. Physical violence has been the fruit of the tree planted and nurtured by the words of politicians.

What happened yesterday was certainly encouraged by the conduct of Gov. George C. Wallace last week in seeking to bar the desegregation of schools in four Alabama cities in compliance with orders of the Federal District Court. True, the Governor at the last moment stepped aside rather than risk contempt proceedings. But by his acts Gov. Wallace had once more set an example for lawless conduct. The death of four children must therefore be placed upon his conscience.

The Negro community of Birmingham will not be terrorized. Let us hope that it will not be provoked into massive counter-violence by this latest and most outrageous crime and thereby play into the hands of the terrorists. Let us hope, too, that the decent white people of Alabama will realize that they have a responsibility to disavow the lawlessness engendered by their political leaders. A beginning of such a manifestation occurred last week when the communities in Alabama where school desegregation had been ordered indicated their entire willingness to obey the orders of the Federal District Court. For a brief time Gov. Wallace stood disavowed even in the Alabama press. Today there is need for even greater repudiation.

Yesterday's event underlines the critical condition of civil rights in Alabama, a condition matched only in Mississippi. In the latter State, as pointed out in a report issued by the Federal Civil Rights Commission last week, terrorism is commonplace. Beatings and economic pressure are both freely engaged in to crush efforts of Negroes to exercise their civil rights, whether to register to vote or even to be served in a bus terminal restaurant. Actually, Mississippi goes far beyond Alabama, with public officers carrying out the acts of violence.

Every thoughtful person, including the President himself, must feel deep concern about the problem presented by these two Southern States which have placed themselves outside of the law. It is difficult to conceive of a plan of action which can deal effectively with such tactics. We shall, of course, continue to witness the determined march of the Negro in the South toward freedom and equality, even if it be again and again marked by the falling by the way of victims of murder and violence. For it is certain that the march will go on and that nothing can turn it back.

On the Northern Scene. Two cases now pending before the New York courts raise squarely the question whether school authorities can rearrange pupil assignments in order to diminish public school segregation.

In one of the cases now pending in the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in Brooklyn, the New York City Board of Education redrew school lines so as to include Negro children in what would otherwise have been a largely white school. This action was challenged as illegal by white parents whose children were assigned as the result of the redistricting to a predominantly Negro school. A Supreme Court Justice upheld the contention of the white parents. His ruling will be reviewed later this month.

In the other case involving a public school at Malverne, Long Island, the State Commissioner of Education intervened and directed a modified "Princeton Plan." This meant that instead of attending their "neighborhood schools," children in certain grades were sent to one school and children in other grades were sent to another. The result was a mixing of children in the grades covered by the order of the Commissioner. Here again, white parents went to court. Since the Commissioner's office is located in the State Capital, suit was instituted and is pending in Albany.

These cases are typical of many which have arisen in Northern communities. They present for determination the extent to which and the manner in which the law may be affirmatively used to deal with the pattern of public school segregation resulting from housing segregation. The resolution of this issue will be no less important to the Negro in the North than was the 1954 Supreme Court decision holding unconstitutional the Southern pattern of school segregation enforced by law. In the North the Negro has the power, both by virtue of his right to vote and by means of demonstration, to compel action by public school authorities which will at least ameliorate school segregation. What remains to be seen is what limits if any the Fourteenth Amendment places upon the power of school authorities to deal with the problem.

The Civil Rights Commission. For the past four years the Federal Civil Rights Commission has been a beacon throwing a revealing light into dark corners in all parts of the country. The resultant exposure has done much to inform the American people of the tremendous gap between the promises of equality embodied in the Constitution and the practices which actually exist.

The Commission thus far has lived on short leases of life. It is scheduled to go out of business at the end of this month unless its tenure is again extended. Already members of the extremely able staff of the Commission have begun to seek employment elsewhere.

The Administration's Civil Rights Bill proposes that the Commission be continued for another four years and that its powers be broadened. The House Judiciary Committee has voted to make it permanent. The Senate has taken no action. Decisive and immediate action by the President is, therefore, essential.

Called for is a rider to some bill scheduled for early enactment so as to assure that the Commission will go on with its work until finally, albeit with less than "all deliberate speed," Congress enacts some civil rights legislation including provision for the Commission. At the moment it would appear unlikely that such over-all legislation will come to a vote much before the end of the year and then probably only after an extended filibuster by the Southern contingent in the Senate.

Malapportionment and the Constitution. On March 26, 1962 the United States Supreme Court, in Baker v. Carr, held that the Federal courts must consider on the merits suits challenging State electoral systems alleged to violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because of malapportionment of legislative representation. Shortly afterwards the Supreme Court extended its ruling so as to place the same obligation upon State courts where they were chosen as the forum.

In its 1962 decisions the Supreme Court refrained from laying down any guide lines for determination of what facts constituted such discrimination as to fall afoul of the Constitution. At the Term which begins next month the Court will be called upon to lay down such standards. There are pending before it six cases involving charges of discrimination against urban voters in Alabama, Maryland, New York and Virginia. All of them are instances in which voters in rural communities have been given a disproportionate power by the creation of rural electoral districts having far smaller population than those in urban centers.

In recent decades the problem of malapportionment has become increasingly serious as a result of the continuing shift of population from country to city and from city to suburb. However, until Baker v. Carr malapportionment remained a problem without a solution since the legislative balance of power rested with persons chosen by rural electors. Understandably, therefore, Baker v. Carr opened the floodgates of litigation throughout the nation.

Last week AJCongress together with the American Civil Liberties Union and the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund submitted a brief amicus curiae to the Supreme Court with respect to the six cases scheduled for hearing. The brief was prepared by Associate Dean Robert B. McKay of New York University Law School. It urges the Supreme Court to state unequivocally that the Equal Protection Clause requires that legislative apportionment follow the equal population principle. In the New York and Maryland cases consent was given by all the parties. Consent was withheld, however, in the other four cases and an application has been made to have the brief considered in those cases as well.

While these cases directly involve only the apportionment of seats in the State legislatures, the impact of the decision of the Supreme Court will have even more far-reaching consequences. State legislatures fix the boundaries of Congressional districts and in doing so favor rural areas. As a result, representation in Congress suffers from the same kind of distortion as exists in State legislatures.

One effect of such discrimination is that large cities and their suburbs fare poorly in the allocation of State and Federal funds. Another is that State legislatures refuse to provide certain areas with the authority and freedom which they need to deal with their complex problems.

Prayer and Bible Reading in the Public School. The Hawthorne, New Jersey Board of Education has taken a leaf out of the Southern notebook in defying the United States Supreme Court. The issue involved, however, is not school segregation; it is Bible reading and recital of the Lord's Prayer. The excuse given by the Board is that the Supreme Court has never specifically ruled on the New Jersey statutes. Actually, they are obviously indistinguishable from the Pennsylvania law stricken down last June.

The State of New Jersey moved promptly to quell the Hawthorne Rebellion. An application for an injunction will be heard in the State Superior Court on September 23. Commenting upon the situation, Gov. Richard J. Hughes said "We're a little unhappy philosophically the way this turned out in the Supreme Court. But prayer or no prayer, Bible or no Bible, it is not too good to be telling growing children 'We think the Supreme Court is wrong and we're not going to pay any attention to it.'"

Public Funds for Church-Related Colleges. Last week suit was instituted in the Maryland courts challenging the appropriations of State funds for buildings at four church-related colleges in that State. Three of the institutions are under Catholic auspices and the other is under Methodist control.

The standing of the plaintiffs to bring such a suit will no doubt be challenged. Moreover, if the Maryland courts reach the merits and hold the appropriations violate the State Constitution, the matter will end there. Only if the State courts uphold the plaintiffs solely on the issue of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, will there be any prospect for review by the United States Supreme Court. In that event, however, a ruling would have national implications since it would also be controlling on the right to spend Federal funds for such purposes. The case is of special importance because a suit can not be brought challenging such Federal appropriations.

Sincerely yours,

Shad Polier

Dear Friend:

Congressional Malapportionment. At the Term which begins next month the United States Supreme Court will decide whether malapportionment of Congressional Districts may be challenged under the Fifth Amendment. At least two cases are on the docket involving instances in which rural-dominated legislatures have fixed boundaries of Congressional districts so as to favor non-urban areas.

In the case arising in Georgia the smallest Congressional district is made up of rural counties having a population of 272,154 according to the 1960 Census, while the largest district, which includes Atlanta, has a population of 823,680. In the case coming up from Washington the variation between Congressional districts ranges from a low of 342,540 to a high of 510,512.

In both instances constitutional challenges were rejected by a three-Judge Federal District Court. In the Washington case the ruling was made on the merits. In the Georgia case the District Court declined to reach the merits on the ground that the situation might be remedied by a legislature elected in compliance with an earlier ruling requiring that the members of at least one branch be chosen on the basis of population. Incidentally, the ruling involving the reapportionment of the Georgia State Legislature is itself pending before the Supreme Court.

On Monday the Department of Justice filed a brief amicus curiae in the Georgia case urging the Supreme Court to hold that Congressional malapportionment is subject to challenge under the Fifth Amendment and suggesting that the case be returned to the District Court for a trial. In view of the fact that there appear to be no factual issues, it would seem that the case is actually ripe for decision not only as to whether the Fifth Amendment applies but also as to whether, upon the facts, the existing malapportionment violates the Amendment. Happily, therefore, the Department of Justice expressed its view upon the merits and took the position that no factors except population equality may be considered in drawing Congressional lines. Obviously that position will also be taken by the Department in the Washington case.

These two cases illustrate the fact that bias against urban areas is not a phenomenon limited to any particular part of the country. As a matter of fact Georgia falls far short of being the most extreme example. Thus, the Congressman from industrial Detroit and its suburbs represents a constituency of 802,994 people whereas a Congressman is chosen by the 177,431 inhabitants of the western half of Michigan's upper peninsula. Indeed, the estimate has been made that if representation were distributed according to population urban and suburban voters would gain up to 40 Congressmen. This would mean a shift of nearly 10% in the voting power in the 435-member House of Representatives.

In the landmark case of Baker v. Carr decided on March 26, 1962, the Supreme Court, as noted in my letter last week, held that the Federal Courts must consider on the merits suits challenging the apportionment of seats in the State legislatures alleged to violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This clause provides that no State shall deprive any person "of equal protection of the laws." The Fifth Amendment contains no such language, but does prohibit the Federal Government from depriving any person of "liberty," without due process of law. The Supreme Court will, therefore, be called upon to decide whether the Fifth Amendment lays down a less stringent test of constitutionality in respect to the apportionment of Congressional districts.

In Bolling v. Sharpe, decided on May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court condemned public school segregation in the District of Columbia under the Amendment at the same time that it struck down similar segregation laws in Delaware, Kansas, South Carolina and Virginia under the Equal Protection Clause. The Court said, "It would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government." The Court, however, carefully reserved for future consideration whether, in a case not involving racial discrimination, the "due process of law" safeguard would always reach discrimination that would be struck down under the "equal protection of the law" prohibition.

It will be interesting to see whether the House of Representatives will ask leave to file a brief amicus curiae opposing the position taken by the Department of Justice. There is precedent for such action. If such a brief is filed, it may well urge that the correction of any evils of Congressional malapportionment should be left for remedy by Congress itself. One argument would be that the traditional doctrine of separation of powers within the branches of the Federal Government, i.e., the President, Congress and the courts, should lead the Court to rule in favor of judicial abstinence. Another argument that would probably be advanced would be that the Constitution contemplated that such matters should be left to the House and the Senate in view of the provisions expressly authorizing them to determine the qualifications of their members. It does not seem to me that either of these arguments is persuasive. It is, of course, almost as unlikely to expect self-reform from Congress as to expect it from State Legislatures.

It may well be that the Supreme Court will feel even freer to sanction judicial reform of Congressional malapportionment. In that situation, there is less of a problem of "State's Rights," Moreover, the remedy is far easier than in the case of directing the reapportionment of seats in the State legislature. The Federal Court would simply direct the election of Congressmen-at-large in the State until proper district lines had been established.

Some commentators have observed that it is impossible to determine whether Democrats or Republicans would be the beneficiaries on an overall basis of a ruling requiring Congressional Districts to be fixed on the basis of population. It is certain, however, that minority groups and particularly Negroes and, in certain parts of the country, Spanish-Americans, would gain in political power. This is true because of their concentration in the cities of the North and the West. It is true also in the South where there has been a tremendous movement of Negroes to the cities from rural areas as the result of their displacement in agriculture because of automation. Moreover, in the South a far higher proportion of Negroes have been able to register as voters in the cities and, in all likelihood, for a considerable time to come this will continue to be the case.

In my judgment, the fixing of Congressional districts on the basis of population is likely to add to the voting strength of the proponents of civil rights legislation. True, this may not, for a considerable time, be the case as far as Congressmen from the South are concerned. On the other hand, even Southern Congressmen chosen under an electoral system which would more truly reflect population distribution are likely to strengthen the vote for economic legislation of which the Negro is particularly in need. For example, as is well known, in the most recent revision of the Federal Wage and Hour Law, Southern Congressmen played a leading role in restricting its coverage so as to exclude areas of employment in which Negroes provided the major labor force. Any one with an awareness of the special aids that will have to be provided by the Federal Government to assist the Negro to gain the skills of which he has been deprived under the Southern System of separate and unequal education in the public schools knows that there will be many situations in the future in which the addition of even a few more liberal Congressmen and the elimination of a few of their conservative opposite numbers could be of tremendous importance.

Thus, again, one of the principal political and social issues of our times appears on the docket of the Supreme Court. Once again, it is to be hoped that the Court will provide fresh hope to those who believe that Government, whether at the State or the National level, can be made into an effective instrumentality for securing a full life for all Americans.

Quotas - Benign and Otherwise. Yesterday the New Jersey Advisory Committee, in a report to the Federal Civil Rights Commission, urged the use of quotas for non-whites in public and private housing, employment and trade union apprenticeship programs, as "a short range solution" to racial discrimination in these areas. No one should quarrel with the Committee's statement that New Jersey presents a "dismal picture of opportunities for Negroes." Unhappily, the picture is hardly different in other Northern States. Nevertheless, in my personal judgment the Committee's proposal is no remedy for the disease.

Insofar as State action is concerned, the imposition of a quota simply cannot be squared with the requirement of equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The Constitution cannot mean one thing in the North and another in the South and it is obvious that quotas which may be benign in the North will be restrictive in the South. There is an even more fundamental objection. The very notion of quotas violates the Constitutional principle that every person is entitled to be treated as an individual.

Those who advocate quotas as "a short range solution" are, it seems to me, actually suggesting that the Constitution be temporarily suspended. History should remind us that a Constitution which can be laid aside to meet the exigencies of the moment is a slim reed upon which to rest the liberties of minorities. It is not so long ago that the same line of reasoning was used to justify the physical removal of Japanese-Americans from the West coast during World War II and placing them in what amounted to concentration camps.

The fatuousness of the quota principle seems to me to be most evident in the proposal that it be applied to limit Negro occupancy of public housing on the ground that otherwise whites will choose to live elsewhere. There are other and better answers to the problem. One is more housing. Another is the more effective enforcement of laws against discrimination in the general housing market.

In the field of employment, vigorous enforcement of anti-discrimination laws is overdue. The time is long past when the system of dealing with the problem on the basis of individual complaints should have been scrapped in favor of authorizing commissions to take the initiative. The time has also gone by when commissions should proceed on the basis of a philosophy that their task is to judge whether discrimination exists rather than to search out and to extirpate it. In short, commissions in these areas are expected to act, and have acted, as bureaucrats rather than as crusaders.

There are, as I see it, no short cuts having any significant potential. On the contrary, the lifting up of a submerged one-tenth of our population will only be achieved when the entire community devotes both energy and funds to the solution of the problem. The sooner this fact is faced, the more surely will panaceas be rejected and the more certainly will the real work be commenced.

Sunday in New York. Last week the New York City Council unanimously approved a fair Sabbath Law permitting small, family-operated businesses to remain open on Sunday if the proprietor and the members of his family observed another Sabbath. It is estimated that the bill which will shortly be signed by Mayor Robert F. Wagner will affect approximately 2,000 stores operated by Orthodox Jews and a few other Sabbatarian groups.

Passage of the measure was authorized by a law enacted by the State Legislature granting such local option only to New York City and requiring its passage before December 31. A proposal to make this option state-wide failed in the Legislature because of the opposition of the Senate Majority Leader, Senator Walter F. Mahoney of Buffalo. Until this year any legislative relaxation was openly opposed by the Catholic Church. That opposition was withdrawn at the recent session of the Legislature, except to the extent that it may have been reflected in the position taken by Senator Mahoney. The Jewish groups, including AJCongress as well as many of the Jewish religious bodies, were supported by the State Council of Churches in their efforts to secure an even broader bill.

In the City Council an amendment was proposed requiring those who wished to take advantage of the local law to register with the Police Department. The proponent of the amendment announced that he was acting upon the suggestion of the American Jewish Committee. His statement has not been disavowed by the Committee. His amendment, however, was disavowed by the Council by a vote of 17-to-6. It should be pointed out that such a registration provision is included in the British law permitting exemption for Sabbatarians. Fortunately, however, what British Jews are willing to tolerate is not acceptable to the overwhelming majority of American Jews, and their fellow Americans understand and respect their sensibilities.

Sincerely yours,

Shad Polier

Dear Friend:

filed w/sh 11/18/63

We enclose herewith the seventh in our annual series of Summaries and Analyses of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the field of civil rights and civil liberties.

The report reveals that the Supreme Court continues to be a steadfast guardian of the liberties of the people as guaranteed in the broad provisions of the Bill of Rights. While the Court is sometimes sharply divided, its major decisions of the past Term, notably in the areas of civil rights and religious liberty, were unanimous or nearly so. Thus, there was no more than one dissenting vote in any of the leading cases of the past Term, the Schempp Bible reading case, the Peterson decision dealing with sit-in demonstrations, the Gray case condemning the "county unit" system in primary elections for statewide office and the Gideon case holding that states must provide indigent defendants with legal counsel for their defense in all criminal cases.

Previous years have seen a division of the Court into a conservative bloc of five and a liberal bloc of four. Changes in the personnel of the Court have given the liberal bloc the same narrow margin. However, it should be noted that, at least during the 1962-63 Term, this division manifested itself principally in cases dealing with procedural points rather than the establishment of fundamental principles.

We trust you will find this Summary and Analysis interesting and useful.

Cordially yours,

Leo Pfeffer

Dear Colleague:

Prosecution or Persecution in Albany, Georgia? Just a year ago the Southern Regional Council published "Albany--A study in National Responsibility." The pamphlet was prepared by Dr. Howard Zinn, Professor of history and social science at Spellman College in Atlanta. It painted a picture of the situation in Albany, Georgia as one of a police state representing the interests of the white 60% of the population and determined to deny to the Negro 40% their basic constitutional rights of freedom of expression, assembly and petition, as well as their fundamental constitutional right to the use of public facilities, such as parks and libraries, on a non-segregated basis. It also pictured an "efficient" police state in which, by and large, the police department acted without brutality, although, as was pointed out, there had been some instances of shocking brutality by police as well as by the notorious county sheriff.

Dr. Zinn was highly critical of the Department of Justice for failing to institute criminal proceedings against local enforcement officials guilty of brutality. My newsletter of December 6, 1962, commenting upon Dr. Zinn's study, urged that the inaction of the Justice Department could not be excused on the ground that a grand jury would not indict. It pointed out that only misdemeanors were involved and that, therefore, prosecution could be initiated on the basis of an information (affidavit) sworn to by the United States Attorney. My letter recognized that it was doubtful that a local Federal jury would convict. On the other hand, it observed that such trials would afford an opportunity to put all the facts on record and thus focus state-wide, nationwide and world-wide opinion upon these outrages and upon a community which tolerated them.

My newsletter took the position that Dr. Zinn was unfair in criticizing the Department of Justice for failure to institute injunction actions to enforce the constitutional rights of the Negro community. It called attention to the fact that Congress had repeatedly refused to grant such power to the Justice Department. Under these circumstances, it concluded that the Department of Justice deserved credit for championing, as amicus curiae, the position of the Negro community in the suits then pending in the Federal District Court.

There were three such suits in 1962. One involved an attempt by the city officials to enjoin Negro demonstrations. The other two were brought by the Negro community to enjoin segregation and exclusion in public and private facilities and to restrain arrests of persons protesting against such practices.

Ultimately, the suit brought by the City was defeated in the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit which set aside a restraining order granted without a hearing by United States District Judge Robert Elliott. He showed no such speed in disposing of the suits brought to defend civil rights. Almost a year passed before he handed down a decision dismissing the suit to end segregation in public facilities, a ruling which was reversed by the Court of Appeals. The more basic suit to restrain illegal arrests still remains undecided by Judge Elliott.

Judge Elliott has recently been involved in another series of Albany, Georgia cases. They grew out of a suit for damages brought by a Negro who had been shot by the sheriff. The action was predicated upon a post-Civil War statute which authorizes the bringing of a suit for damages in the Federal courts by a person alleging an invasion of his civil rights by a State law enforcement officer.

Shortly after the jury brought in a verdict for the sheriff last April, Dr. William G. Anderson, a Negro physician who was then the leader of the Albany Movement, made a speech in which he urged Negroes not to patronize the supermarket operated by one of the jurors, Carl Smith, in the Negro neighborhood in Albany. At the time that Dr. Anderson made his speech, it was common talk that Smith had publicly declared that the sheriff's only wrongdoing was in failing to kill the Negro who had brought suit against him.

On April 20 Smith's supermarket was twice picketed by Negroes. On the first occasion the pickets were dispersed by the police. The second time they were arrested. Although the picketing was stopped, the Negro community withheld its patronage, with the result that Smith sold his business.

On August 8, Dr. Anderson and two other Negroes were indicted by the Federal grand jury on the charge of conspiring to obstruct the administration of justice by encouraging the picketing and boycotting of Smith's supermarket. On the same date perjury indictments were returned against five Negroes for obstructing the investigation of the charges against Dr. Anderson. In substance, the charge was that they had falsely denied conferring together at an attorney's office after receiving grand jury subpoenas, and prior to testifying before the grand jury.

Also indicted for perjury was Joni Rabinowitz, a 22-year old New Yorker. As part of her work program at Antioch College, she was working in the Albany area as a field representative of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) in its efforts to combat racial segregation and to encourage Negro voter registration. She was charged with falsely testifying before the grand jury that she had not witnessed the picketing on April 20.

All of the defendants challenged the indictments on the ground that Negroes had been systematically excluded from the grand jury. They also moved for a change of the place of trial on the ground that local prejudice was such that a fair trial could not be obtained in the Federal District where Albany is located. These objections were peremptorily denied by Judge Elliott and Dr. Anderson was forced to immediate trial before Judge Elliott.

The outcome of the trial of Dr. Anderson proved to be a surprise. The jury failed to reach a verdict, three of the jurors holding out for acquittal. They were obviously unpersuaded that Dr. Anderson had done anything beyond making the speech denouncing Smith or that he had organized the picketing and boycott. Anyone familiar with the temper of the white community can only marvel that there were three jurors of such fortitude to hold out for an acquittal. Nevertheless, the Justice Department insists that Dr. Anderson be tried again. His retrial has been set for next April.

Miss Rabinowitz was convicted today despite the fact that there was overwhelming evidence that she was not present at the scene of the picketing. Her conviction rested upon the testimony of Smith, his son-in-law and a white employee. The jury chose to disregard the testimony of the pickets and of Miss Rabinowitz, that she was not there, the testimony of another white student who had been upon the scene, and the testimony of many distinguished persons who had come to Albany for the purpose of testifying to Miss Rabinowitz' reputation for veracity.

The appeal in Miss Rabinowitz' case will raise the issues presented in Dr. Anderson's as to the illegal composition of the jury and the impossibility of obtaining a fair trial in the Albany District. The prejudice which Miss Rabinowitz faced was, of course, even greater than that which confronted Dr. Anderson, for to Albany, Georgia she was an "outside agitator," was "agitating" in the most sensitive area by seeking to secure the right of the Negro to vote, and was white and a woman. Realizing the odds against securing an unprejudiced jury, her counsel asked that she be tried by District Judge William A. Bootle without a jury. The application had to be denied because the United States Attorney refused to waive a jury trial.

Although Miss Rabinowitz is white, it seems to me that she has standing to challenge the indictment on the ground that the grand jury had been selected so as to exclude Negroes. The issue involved was completely enmeshed with the struggle of Negroes for civil rights. Consequently, the exclusion of Negroes was surely no less prejudicial than if she had been a Negro.

That the challenge to the grand jury was well taken is indicated by the fact that the jury box (from which grand jurors are selected) contained 1985 names of which only 117 (5.89% of the total) were the names of Negroes. In the 18 counties which comprise the Division in which Albany is located, 78,017 of the 211,306 persons over 21 years of age (i. e., 34.55% of the total) were Negro. This disparity would seem to be accounted for by several factors. For one thing, names of prospective jurors are taken from State tax lists which are kept separate on the basis of race. Furthermore, those making the selection consulted their friends and these were almost exclusively white persons. In addition, it was shown that while inquiries were made of white fraternal church and civic organizations, no similar inquiry was directed to their Negro counterparts.

In sum, the proof as to systematic exclusion of Negroes appears to be stronger in these cases than in many instances in which State court convictions have been set aside as violating the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It would seem likely that an even stricter standard of fairness in jury selection will be imposed by the Supreme Court in the exercise of its supervisory powers over the lower Federal courts.

The indictment in Miss Rabinowitz' case was challenged on still another ground. When she was called as a witness before the grand jury, the United States Attorney asked about her activities relating to voter registration and her social relations with Negroes and her background. These inquiries no doubt inflamed the grand jury and, it seems to me, made her indictment certain.

Obviously, there was no need to call Miss Rabinowitz as a witness before the grand jury. She was not charged with being a picket and thereby participating in the alleged retaliation against Smith for his vote as a juror. Moreover her testimony was not necessary in order to determine who had engaged in the picketing. The identity of the pickets was known to the police and indeed the pickets had been arrested by the police. It seems to me a fair conclusion, therefore, that the United States Attorney used the power of his office to subject Miss Rabinowitz to prosecution because she was engaged in activities which are deeply disapproved of by the white community. It is not strange that a United States Attorney, who owes his office to the endorsement of Georgia Senators, should use his office for such purpose. It is, however, outrageous that the Attorney General of the United States should have permitted such conduct.

In my judgment, it also appears that the indictment of Dr. Anderson was in reality an attempt to punish him for his denunciation of Smith. That denunciation was protected against prosecution because of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech. The Constitution is, of course, no bar to prosecution for conspiracy. But as the hung jury testifies, the conspiracy charge verged upon the incredible.

It is no explanation of these indictments to say that the Albany prosecutions simply represent the determination of the Government to bring to justice whoever interferes with the administration of the law, whether he be white or Negro. Of course, Negroes and whites alike must be punished if they obstruct justice. This, however, seems to me to be too glib an explanation for what has happened in the Albany cases.

The suspicion will not down that the Justice Department has become a party to injustice in an effort to persuade the South that it is acting even-handedly. In the end, I believe, all the convictions will be set aside. There will, however, remain the stain of what, in my judgment, has been a misuse of the power of the Federal Government to pander to local prejudice.

Footnotes to the Above. At the Rabinowitz trial there were only 3 Negroes among the 93 jurors summoned. None of the Negroes was drawn for her trial. In Dr. Anderson's case, one was drawn and was promptly removed by the Government's peremptory challenge.

A few days after the Anderson trial Judge Elliott again demonstrated his completely segregationist views. On November 1 he was the dissenter in a ruling by a 3-Judge District Court holding unconstitutional Georgia's insurrection statute under which four civil rights workers were held without bail on the ground that the law provided for the death penalty. Unfortunately, Judge Elliott is all too typical in his views of a number of other appointments made by the present Administration.

In seeking to waive a jury trial, Miss Rabinowitz' counsel was, of course, aware of the fact that Judge Bootle represents a different judicial tradition. This is not to say that all Eisenhower appointees are vigorous champions of civil rights, although on the average their performance has probably been more than a cut above President Kennedy's. In Judge Bootle's case, however, his attitude had been indicated by his ruling two years ago in directing the University of Georgia to admit Negroes as students.

Sincerely yours,

Lloyd Potter

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING

November 1-3, 1963

Statement on QUOTAS AND RACE RELATIONS

The American Jewish Committee strongly supports the constitutional principle that civil rights are individual, not group rights. Law protects individuals against discrimination based on race, color or creed; it does not protect or prefer groups or entire categories such as minorities. The legal recognition of groups even for benign reasons would give rise to a new political principle, one that would perforce make of the group the source of individual rights -- a principle repugnant to democracy. We therefore oppose any attempt to create a system of quotas as such for Negroes or anyone else in housing, employment, education and other areas.

However, we must recognize that Negroes, as a group, have been discriminated against systematically and deprived of the normal benefits and opportunities of society. Consequently, only large-scale measures deliberately designed to establish a new place in society for Negroes will be effective. Since Negroes have suffered discrimination in jobs, housing and schools for generations, it is incumbent upon the nation to provide measures to help close the wide and growing gap which separates the overwhelming masses of Negroes from other Americans. To be meaningful, equality of treatment in all walks of life must be the foundation upon which is constructed a new social framework of supportive devices enabling the individual Negro to overcome a heritage of social deprivation.

America has historically rendered special assistance to special categories of people upon whom society has enforced extra burdens and who have had special needs that could not otherwise be met. These have included, among others, veterans, workers, farmers, migrants and the aged. We think, therefore, that agreement should be sought on a crash program that would help Negroes and members of other minority groups to overcome their disadvantaged positions. Such a program should include the following elements:

Education Provision for first-class schools for culturally deprived children, with the most modern facilities and the best teachers; intensified remedial instruction in the lower grades for such children; intensified efforts by schools and colleges to seek out qualified Negro and other disadvantaged youths; after-school tutoring programs; expanded adult education programs geared to the needs of citizens lacking basic literary and technical skills; and assumption of responsibility by school officials and boards of education for achieving school integration wherever educationally feasible through such devices as site selection, the redrawing of district lines and rezoning where practicable.

Employment The enactment of federal and state fair employment practices legislation to ban discrimination in public and private employment; intensification and expansion of apprenticeship and training programs -- both by management and unions -- in order to increase the reservoir of trained Negro and white manpower; assumption by employers and unions of greater responsibility for making all categories and levels of employment available to qualified Negroes and other minority workers without discrimination.

Housing The extension of the President's Executive Order on discrimination in housing to cover all existing public and publicly assisted housing, and housing covered by mortgages of lending institutions supervised or chartered by the Federal Government; the adoption of fair housing laws and ordinances by states and cities; and the assumption by builders, developers and real estate operators of responsibility for building and operating open occupancy developments and promoting racial diversity in communities throughout the country.

We urge the development of intergroup relations training programs in schools, in housing projects, in industry and unions, and elsewhere.

We also urge all our members, and indeed all American citizens, to express their personal commitment to these objectives and to extend their direct support for the achievement of these goals.

The cause of integration will be better served if less energy and attention are devoted to controversy over a "quota" system, and more to the broader scene. Only imaginative, vastly-conceived programs can cope with this situation. Our energies should be devoted toward that end.

URGENT, PLEASE

"LET US PUT AN END TO THE TEACHING AND PREACHING OF HATE AND EVIL AND VIOLENCE"

Do you agree that the concluding remarks of President Johnson's first address to the Congress of the United States should be etched into the consciousness of all Americans?

Our nation has undergone a tragic and horrifying experience. Can we learn and benefit from it. or shall we allow the expression of extremist excess and violence to become the norm for the conduct of national affairs?

Much of the answer lies with the human relations, educational and civic agencies-government and voluntary-and the key individuals to whom we are addressing this communication.

Will you pool your effort with ours toward the establishment of a national climate wherein "the apostles of bitterness and bigotry...and those who pour venom into our nation's bloodstream" will find no sustenance?

Will you help us to spread President Johnson's words throughout the land?

We need your immediate reply.*

Dear David:

I am sending you enclosed three (3) copies each of the Charlotte and Louisville reports as you requested.

As I said yesterday, we have no objection to your condensing these, or otherwise using the reports in the best interests of the Seminar. If you do go ahead with the condensations, we would appreciate an opportunity to scan your manuscript.

I hope you were able to reach John Feild about the Memphis report. We shall send that off to be multilithed early next week. On it, and the remaining three studies, we do not intend to do a press release. The Brunswick report has been written by Pat Watters, and has laid on my desk for over a week still unread. I shall get to it quickly.

As you know the fifth city we have planned to do is Baton Rouge. We have not yet gone over there.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Dear Leslie:

Enclosed is a mimeographed copy of "Crime and Race: Conceptions and Misconceptions," by Marvin E. Wolfgang, scheduled for publication by the Institute of Human Relations Press of the American Jewish Committee immediately after Labor Day.

In view of the importance of its subject matter, we are bringing this to your attention to permit you to decide if you would like to order a large quantity. In quantity, copies will cost about 50¢ -- less if a large enough pre-printing order permits an increased run. In order to have some idea of the size of the printing run, it is important for us to have reactions by Monday, July 6th.

Many thanks for your prompt consideration of this matter.

Cordially yours,

Harry

INTRODUCTION

Even though Americans are accustomed to forming opinions on a multitude of complex issues, most of us recognize that certain questions, especially those in the realm of scientific research, cannot be weighed without highly specialized knowledge. Thus, few persons outside of professional circles feel equipped by training or experience to discuss nuclear physics.

Another and no less difficult topic is human behavior. Whether in individual or group form, it is one of the most complex objects of study; yet, because we are all involved in social life in ways that require some understanding of how to relate ourselves to others, most of us do not hesitate to voice opinions about the major facets of human behavior.

Nor is it surprising that the opinions of the general public are frequently less cautious than those expressed by social scientists. Although scientific research has discovered much about man and his interrelationships, scholars with free and open minds are trained to refrain from making definitive statements where evidence is lacking or research has not adequately probed.

This attitude of scientists, combined with the public's proximity to social issues and its selective experience, render many highly sensitive topics of social concern vulnerable to misconceptions.

Race is one of the most widely discussed and important social issues in America today, commanding far more attention than crime. This is not to say that the American people are disinterested in crime; it is plainly recognized in the press and on the screen as a theme of compelling attraction. And as the public is informed through repeated announcements that rates of crime and delinquency are rising, communities are asking more questions about the causes, and seeking solutions.

An independent concern with each of these ~~two~~ topics, race and crime, invariably results in an interest about how the two are related. It is important to the successful solution of problems that the blending of these interests be accomplished through unhurried, unbiased appraisals, not through efforts to "prove" preconceived conclusions. It is the purpose of this booklet to discuss the best available evidence on the combined topics of race and crime, to examine the causes and extent of their relationship, if any, and to dispel misconceived notions about them.

There are enormous problems in understanding the meaning of each of these terms, race and crime, let alone their interaction. Many scholars have devoted their lives to research on each; fewer have examined the two together. Most of what research on each topic has discovered fits together into compelling theories, but not inevitable laws, of human conduct. Perhaps, however, some of the most important things we have learned are negative, telling us that certain conclusions are not true.

It is obvious even to the most casual observer that some minority groups, particularly Negroes, experience a more narrow range of life's alternatives, or choices, and encounter more restrictions than do whites. It is also well known that society's reaction to the criminal is still partly that of retribution, or an eye-for-an-eye, however much the ideas of reformation have grown in this century. Even with a sometimes expiatory philosophy suggesting that an offender must pay his debt to society, that same society rarely wipes the slate clean and encourages his smooth return from prison to the community. Instead, the label of having been arrested, even if not convicted -- or worse, of having been convicted and imprisoned -- is sewn to one's personal history with the threads of suspicion, fear and unforgiveness.

Despite the handicaps faced by most criminal offenders upon their release, it is not farfetched to suggest that the law-abiding Negro non-offender suffers more from prejudice, discrimination and segregation than the returning white criminal suffers from a community's rejection. There are probably more restrictions placed on the man with color than on the man with crime.

When crime and color converge, the person is in double jeopardy. To the visible badge of color is added the label of criminal, not affixed to his skin but to the file of records that destroy his anonymity and promote antipathy. Attitudes of prejudice and acts of discrimination are compounded. The likelihood that any inmate's return to the community will be successful and free from violation of the law is less than 50-50 When the handicaps of belonging to a minority group further reduce the chances of finding acceptance and a job, it is not surprising that crimes are often repeated.

What is most regrettable is that many people -- partly from exaggeration of a few facts, partly from a readiness to believe -- strongly associate the two factors of color and crime. In so doing, they not only make more difficult the plight of the colored offender; they also begin to see color as sufficient reason for suspecting crime. The effects of this mental association go far beyond a seize-and-search police policy. The private citizen clinging to a false premise is soon beset by false fears and driven to hasty reprisals that damage efforts to integrate community life.

If information is an aid to understanding, and if correct information leads to better understanding, then there is merit in sifting facts from flaws in the ideas associated with race and crime. To do so, we must examine the meaning of race, the meaning of crime and criminal statistics, the ways in which race and crime converge, the interpretations of that convergence, the most plausible explanations of criminal conduct among minority groups, and the efforts needed to effect change.

THE MEANING OF RACE

The Genetic View

In 1855, J. C. Prichard of England stated a position which has been supported by a century of scientific study. "The different races of man," he said, "are not distinguished from each other by strongly marked, uniform and permanent distinctions, as are the species belonging to any given tribe of animals. All the diversities which exist are variable, and pass into each other by insensible gradations."(1)

In 1950, an international panel of physical anthropologists and geneticists, having met under the auspices of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization to arrive at a consensus about the definition of race, published a statement that was a century-old echo of Prichard. The term race, they said, designates "a group or population characterized by some concentrations, relative as to frequency and distribution, of hereditary particles (genes) or physical characteristics, which appear, fluctuate, and often disappear in the course of time by reason of geographic and/or cultural isolation."(2) All men are derived from the same source and belong to the same species. The differences among them, the report asserted, are due to evolutionary factors, such as isolation, mixing and natural selection.

The study of genetics refers to that branch of biology concerned with reproduction, heredity, development and evolution. This science has found that all races share the same genes, so there are not certain genes exclusive to one racial group. Different races, therefore, are due to the relative frequency and concentration of particular genes.

Over the centuries, man has classified himself by using skin color, eye color and form, hair color and form, stature, shape of the nose, blood type, cephalic index (head shape) and many other criteria. It is true, of course, that different races have different concentrations of these items. The Chinese, for example, have relatively more persons with Blood Type A_1 and relatively fewer with A_2; but the blood of an Oriental with Type A_1 is indistinguishable from Type A_1 in a Negro or white and can be exchanged in transfusion.(3)

The cephalic index is probably the most commonly used measurement in physical anthropology for classificatory purposes, perhaps because it is easy to use. This index refers to the ratio of the maximum breadth to the maximum length of the head, and groupings have included long or narrow headed, middle or medium headed, and short or broad headed. But as Ruth Benedict pointed out, "Narrow heads are found among uncivilized primitives and among powerful and cultivated Western Europeans; broad heads are too. Neither the narrow heads of the whole world nor the broad heads stack up to show any obvious monopoly of glorious destiny or any corner on ability or virtue.... The cephalic index does not serve to distinguish the white race from the Mongoloid nor from the Negro...."[4]

Anatomical specialization is certainly recognized among groups classified as Mongoloid, Negroid and Caucasoid, but many individuals cannot be assigned to one or another group on the basis of even a few of the criteria mentioned above. Advances in medicine, nutrition and sanitation so affect the structure of peoples that none of the races can be reliably distinguished by size, weight, or length of life.

Some tribes of Negro pygmies average under four feet tall; among other Negro tribes, like the Watusi (or, more correctly, the Batutsi) an adult under six feet is considered short. Whites generally have a longer life expectancy than other racial groups, but the American Negro born today has a life expectancy far greater than the American white born as late as the turn of the century. Obviously the change is due to modern advances in medicine.

Finally, as Franz Boas pointed out a generation ago, "The study of averages and variabilities has proved that human populations inhabiting adjoining territories overlap in regard to most features, so that it is not possible to assign with certainty any one individual to a definite group.... There are no races of man in which no overlapping occurs in regard to all the traits examined. Negroes and Europeans may be tall or short, round headed or long headed, large or small brained. The averages and variabilities of these traits may differ, but the distributions are such that many if not most values are common to both races."(5)

No reproduction is possible across different species; they are genetically closed systems. But man represents only one species, and the races of man are genetically open systems. All members of the human species can mate and produce offspring of various blendings. Race is a matter of degree, and technically, as R. R. Korn and L. W. McCorkle suggest, one should not say "Negro," "Chinese" or "white," but how much Negro, how much Chinese, how much white.(6)

Using a sample of over 5,000 Negroes from all over the United States between 1915 and 1926, M. J. Herskovits estimated that no more than 22 per cent of all persons designated as Negro were of unmixed ancestry. Of the rest, nearly 15 per cent were more white than Negro, about one-fourth were equally white and Negro, approximately 32 per cent were more Negro than white, and about 6 per cent were Negro mixed with Indian.(7)

There is no reason to suppose that these proportions are any different among Negro offenders. In 1939, E. A. Hooton divided over 4,000 Negro prisoners, mostly from Southern states, into subgroupings and discovered from anthropometric examinations that over 80 per cent were a mixture of Negro with some other race, while less than 20 per cent were unmixed Negroes.[8] As Julian Huxley remarked, "Man is unique among species of animals in the degree to which crossing between already differentiated groups and types has taken place. Accordingly, multiple ancestry is at least as important as common ancestry in considering the nature and origins of any group."[9]

One final word needs be said in view of the recent publication of C. S. Coon's The Origin of Races, in which the author suggests that the races evolved into their present biological stage at different points in time; more particularly, that the Negro race trailed behind the white race.[10] In reviewing this book, William Howells, Chairman of the Department of Anthropology at Harvard University, commented that whatever may be one's theory concerning the origin of races, it cannot be relevant to measuring differences between races today.[11] The famous geneticist, Theodosius Dobzhansky, agrees with the generally held contention which Coon supports, namely, that the present species known as Homo sapiens is descended from Homo erectus of the mid-Pleistocene period. But Coon's belief that Homo erectus evolved into Homo sapiens in five different stages and much earlier in some places than others is clearly not shared by Dobzhansky. "This belief," he says "is neither supported by conclusive evidence nor plausible on theoretical grounds. Moreover ...repeated origins of the same species are so improbable that this conjecture is not worthy of serious consideration; and given a gene flow, it becomes fallacious to say that a species has originated repeatedly, and even more fallacious to contend that it has originated five times, or any other number above one."[12]

The Legal and Social View

Unfortunately, men are not commonly rational about race. Besides its definition from the viewpoint of geneticists and physical anthropologists, race has a legal and a social meaning. In those states, for example, where miscegenation (interracial marriage) is prohibited, the term "Negro" is defined legally, with variations, as anyone with one-fourth, one-eighth or one-sixteenth Negro ancestry. In Georgia and North Carolina, any "ascertainable" trace of Negro ancestry classifies one as a Negro.

The important point to remember is that the historical condition of Negroes as the only ethnic group in America ever subjected to slavery has caused them to be given a particular legal and social status.

Even without a legally established status, race is defined by social usage. When people are crudely classified by appearance, and when statistics are recorded on that basis, genetic validity is sacrificed to social custom.[13] Despite the fact that

Negroes are not biologically unique, they are socially treated as a distinct, relatively isolated group. In this sense, so are Puerto Ricans, Mexican-Americans and some other minority groups. In New York and Los Angeles, a Spanish name or appearance, the circumstance of being a migrant or child of a migrant from Puerto Rico or Mexico are among the accepted criteria of ethnic grouping. Mexican-Americans in Los Angeles County are viewed as a group distinct from Anglo-whites.(14)

The racial classifications used by the Bureau of the Census are based mostly upon enumerators' observations, although in the 1960 census it was possible for members of a household to classify themselves. As the Bureau reports, its concept of race "is derived from that which is commonly accepted by the general public. It does not reflect clear-cut definitions of biological stock, and several categories obviously refer to national origin."(15)

As long as segregation and discrimination persist, and the struggle for more participation in society continues, there may be some utility in the statistical designation of race, simply to keep an accounting of social problems and to measure the progress of change in the economic and political status of minority groups.(16)

Those who still act as if the social definition of race were genetically valid are especially interested in the many reports on intelligence testing, because Negro average scores are usually presented as lower than white average scores. It was shocking news to many persons when they first read in Ruth Benedict's classic pamphlet, The Races of Mankind (1943) that Army intelligence tests during World War I showed Northern Negroes from New York, Illinois and Ohio with higher median scores than Southern whites from Mississippi, Kentucky and Arkansas. That such findings were not due to the selective migration of intelligent Negroes from the South to the North, but rather to better educational opportunities in the North, was the general conclusion of O. Klineberg's important study, that of E. Lee and others.[17-18]

As long ago as 1848, John Stuart Mill was cognizant of the influence of cultural environment on behavior: "Of all vulgar modes of escaping from the considerations of the effect of social and moral influence on the human mind, the most vulgar is that of attributing the diversities of conduct and character to inherent natural differences."[19]

This is not the place to discuss the numerous studies of intelligence scores, but we should note the statements by leading authorities, reported in Race and Intelligence (edited by Melvin Tumin), which were, in effect, rebuttals to Audrey Shuey's The Testing of Negro Intelligence.[20-21] Especially cogent was the response of Sherwood Washburn: "...when two groups of whites differ in their IQ's, the explanation of the difference is immediately sought in schooling, environment, economic position of parents, and so on, but...when Negroes and whites differ in precisely the same way the difference is said to be genetic."[22] Substituting "crimes" for "IQ's," precisely the same statement would hold true. When the homicide rate for whites is found to be four times higher in Georgia than in Massachusetts, the difference is explained in terms of the surrounding cultural and socio-economic conditions. But when the crime rate of Negroes is found to be generally four times higher than the rate for whites, some racist-minded persons are quick to invent a genetic interpretation of the difference.

Resort to racism, or a "genetic" explanation of differences in mental abilities, personality or conduct, is universally discredited by scholars in genetics who perceive racial differences principally in terms of the history of man's physical movements and cultural change. In fact, under the leadership of Franz Boas, the scientific attack on racism in America was firmly established as far back as the 1920's. By then, says Thomas Gossett, "racism had developed into such a contradictory mass of the unprovable and the emotional that the serious students eventually recognized that as a source of explanation it was worthless."[23] As we shall see, it is equally worthless as an explanation for criminal conduct.

THE MEANING OF CRIME

The history of man is a story of social organization and disorganization. Wherever there is human conduct there is human misconduct, and every society establishes rules to govern the relationships among its members. In primitive cultures without written codes of behavior, informal modes of control are sufficient to maintain social harmony, but as a society becomes complicated by urbanization, rapid change and heterogeneity of population, the rights and rules of life are formalized into statutes that define more precisely what is expected of us. But the definition of acts that are viewed as harmful is always culturally subjective; one of the clichés of social analysis is that crime varies from place to place and from time to time. Even acts like murder, rape and theft, which appear to be nearly universally condemned, must be considered in terms of who perform them and who are victimized.

Legal and Sociological Definitions

From a legal perspective, crime is an act that violates the social norms, and its prohibition is buttressed by a punishment, administered by the state through a proceeding in its own name.[24] From a broader sociological view, J. L. Gillin has defined crime as "an act that is socially harmful, or that is believed to be socially harmful by a group that has the power to enforce its beliefs and that places such act under the ban of positive penalties."[25] It is obvious, from this approach, that the definition of crime is relative, for whether an act is socially harmful depends on the interpretation of some group -- that group, as Gillin says, which has sufficient power to make its beliefs an effective and functioning part of the social order.

In primitive society, the group with such dominance may be a council of elders or the young warriors who usurp power from their elders. In the Middle Ages, the group that defined crime was the Church, and heresy was the most heinous of acts. The military clique in prewar Japan, Mussolini and his cohorts in Italy, Hitler and the Nazi party in Germany -- all had their moments and enforced their beliefs upon the national states they controlled.

Totalitarianism concentrates dominance, democracy diffuses it. But even in a democratic society there are groups, like the majority of voters, who hold the power to enforce their beliefs of right and wrong. In early America, persons without property were not voters; and not until the 20th century did women in the United States gain the right to exercise power at the polls. Until only recently, Negroes in this country had virtually no chance to participate as citizens expressing their beliefs, no voice in the definition of acts declared offensive to the social order.

"Love thy neighbor as thyself" may be a useful rule, but in the absence of a penal sanction, failure to abide by it is no crime. To be a crime, an act must be punished. To some extent, the degree of harm which an act involves is partially reflected in the severity of the punishment. From death to reprimand, society expresses its collective concern for the harm. But as the times change, so do the people's concerns. What was defined as a crime years ago is no longer such; what was not criminal before may be deemed so now. Our national experiment in the prohibition of alcohol dramatized this lesson of change.

Moreover, each state jurisdiction in the United States has its own penal code, and what is criminal in one state may not be outlawed in another. Thus, in Oregon, fornication is punished with up to five years' imprisonment; but in New York, California and 11 other states, it is not a crime. In Colorado, Georgia, and Nevada, sodomy can bring life imprisonment, but in New Hampshire and Vermont it is not a crime. In all states, forcible rape is a crime, but the maximum penalty varies from death in 19 states to five years' imprisonment in Rhode Island.

If a sexual relationship occurs between a girl under a certain age and a boy over a certain age, with mutual participation and consent, it is considered statutory rape. The age division is usually 16 or 18 years, so that a 16-year-old boy having consensual relations with a 15-year-old girl in Pennsylvania is guilty of rape and subject to a maximum of 15 years in prison. In Texas the maximum penalty is death when the "victim" is under 18; but in Delaware it is not a crime if the victim is over seven years old.

Similarly inconsistent is the division of offenses into misdemeanors and felonies. What is a misdemeanor, or presumably petty offense, in one state may be a felony, or presumably serious crime, in another. It has been estimated that as many as one-third of the acts today declared criminal were not defined as crimes at the turn of the century. Such then, are the variations over time and place.

At different times throughout the world the ruling regimes have created legal rationales for subjecting minority groups to differential treatment. To have had the status of a Jew in Hitler Germany was tantamount to being a criminal. Even in American law, there have been offenses that applied only to Negroes. In the early 18th century in Connecticut, Massachusetts and New Jersey, it was no crime for a white man to strike a Negro, but a Negro who struck a white man was to be flogged. In six Northern states (Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, New Jersey, New York, Ohio), a Negro could not testify against a white, and the statements of any two whites superseded those of any number of Negroes. This kind of situation no longer exists in the law. But, as we shall see, the status of being Negro still carries a vulnerability to being labeled criminal which does not equally apply to the status of being white.

The Measurement of Crime - Unrecorded Offenses

One may well ask how we measure crime and obtain reliable and valid data about offenders. The answer, of course, is that we can only make estimates based upon the best scientific procedures available. Attempts to measure crime have a long history; yet in the United States, our present system goes back only as far as 1930, when the U.S. Department of Justice started a publication known as Uniform Crime Reports. This compilation of national crime statistics is based on reports turned in voluntarily by police units throughout the country. They are called "uniform" because, as the result of diligent efforts in the late 1920's, a system was devised by which the varied definitions of crime in the various states could be catalogued and classified for tabular purposes. Thus, quasi-legal categories were used for a set of offenses sufficiently broadly defined so that all jurisdictions could render an accounting of substantially the same crimes, regardless of the penalties attached to them.

Thanks to the diligent efforts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in checking on the recording procedures of local communities, over 90 per cent of the country is now covered by this national uniform procedure. Cities from time to time have been dropped and added, due to changes in the efficiency or reliability of their records.

From these efforts to gather information there has emerged a category consisting of seven crimes generally known as the "crime index." Modified slightly in 1958, these index offenses are: criminal homicide (murder and nonnegligent manslaughter), forcible rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary, larceny ($50 and over) and auto theft.

The meaning of "index" should be borne in mind. Just as a cost of living index does not include all consumer items, a crime index does not include all criminal acts. It contains a purposively selected number of items and is designed to reflect accurately the total from which they are drawn. On the assumption that offenses in a crime index should be relatively serious and likely to be regularly reported to the police -- not acts (like gambling and prostitution), whose fluctuations in volume reflect the degree of police activity, ranging from raids to quiet tolerance, nor acts (like fornication) concealed from the police by mutual consent of those involved -- the seven offenses listed above were chosen by a national panel as the best guages for determining the amount of crime in a community, a state or the nation.

It is generally agreed that the most valid criminal statistics for index purposes are those which, procedurally, are closest to the commission of crime. This is why offenses known to the police are better than court statistics on convictions or prison statistics on commitments. However, it is important to recognize that there are many differences between "offenses known to the police" and "offenders taken into custody." Furthermore, even the earliest stage of crime recording, at the police level, does not yield a total picture of the amount of crime and delinquency in a community. Police statistics are the best we have, but it is obvious that many more crimes occur than are ever reported. In criminological literature these unrecorded offenses are often referred to as "hidden delinquency" or "the dark numbers" of crime.

There are a dozen or so studies made by criminologists throughout the world suggesting what most of us suspect -- that all of us have at one time or another committed violations of the law beyond simple traffic offenses. J. S. Wallerstein and C. J. Wyle some years ago devised a questionnaire which they submitted to a cross section of the New York population.[26] Although this study was not based on a rigorous research design and therefore has limitations, its findings have been confirmed by other, more thoroughgoing investigations. Wallerstein and Wyle listed 49 offenses with brief descriptions, to determine how many persons had committed them and how often. On the list were 14 felonies carrying a penalty of at least two years in a state penitentiary. It is clear that these 49 offenses constituted only a fraction of the hundreds of acts specifically prohibited in the criminal law of New York. Murder was not included, but there were other unsavory offenses, among them assault, robbery, burglary, larceny, perjury, extortion, gambling, bribery, tax evasion.

Of the 1,698 responses, admittedly biased toward the upper socio-economic class, 99 per cent said they had committed one or more of the criminal offenses as juveniles under 16 or as adults over that age, without ever having been arrested. The average number committed by the 1,020 men was 18, with a mean number of 8.2 for clergymen and 20.2 for laborers. Women laborers admitted 9.8 offenses after reaching 16 years of age, but women in military and government jobs admitted 14.4. The mean number for all women was 11. Both sexes said their breaches occurred more frequently after 16 years of age, the men averaging only 3.2 juvenile offenses and the women 1.6. Both reported that their offenses increased progressively from age 21 to 40 and then declined. Nearly two-thirds of the men and about three out of every 10 women said they were guilty of one or more of the 14 serious felonies. The per cent of men and women reporting their criminal conduct by type of offense was as follows:

Offense	Per Cent Men	Per Cent Women

In another study, Professor Austin Porterfield compared the frequency of criminal and delinquent offenses of 337 college students (200 men and 137 women) with the number of offenses committed by over 2,000 boys whose cases were brought to the juvenile court at Fort Worth.[27] The court cases involved 55 specific offenses ranging from "shooting spit wads at a wrestling match" to murder. What is striking in this study is that 100 per cent of both male and female students admitted they had committed offenses. One of the theological students said he had committed 27 of the 55 offenses. There was one case of murder admitted and one case of negligent homicide; in both instances no charges were ever made.

While there may be some skepticism about these admissions, repeated studies confirm that offenses committed by normally law-abiding citizens are far in excess of the number known to the police or committed by persons actually taken into custody. Porterfield compared the frequency with which the same offenses were committed on the average by 100 college men and by boys in court, showing that the college men committed far more offenses than the juvenile-court boys were charged with. Of the college men, about 5 per cent admitted attempted rape in precollege days, and 25 per cent admitted indecent exposure. The average number of offenses in precollege days was 17.5.

In Washington, D. C., Edward Schwartz conducted a study on the amount of delinquency coming to the attention of the juvenile court, compared to the amount coming to the attention of other public agencies which share responsibility for dealing with delinquent children.[28] For a year, careful records were kept of all cases of delinquency known to the police, the schools and welfare agencies. These cases were then checked against the court records in order to determine the proportion that actually came to the attention of the court. In sum, only 43 per cent of the cases known to these other agencies were handled by the court. It was not known how many other cases were handled by private agencies, families, churches and other community resources. Although this was a localized study in Washington, there is no reason to believe that the situation would be very different elsewhere.

A research on the hidden delinquency of 61 boys who never had been brought to court and 40 who had been court cases was reported in 1946.[29] These boys (in the communities of Cambridge and Somerville, near Boston, Massachusetts) admitted a total of 6,416 offenses, of which only 95, or 1½ per cent, had ever given rise to a court hearing. About 1,400 were infractions of city ordinances, none of which even resulted in a complaint. There were 4,400 minor offenses, of which only 27, or six-tenths of 1 per cent, were prosecuted. And only 11 per cent (or 68) of the 616 serious offenses resulted in punishment. These were admitted to social workers who knew the delinquents well and had obtained their confidence.

Students of the problem, including F. I. Nye and others, have examined the relationship between hidden, unofficial, unrecorded delinquency and social class. The thesis is generally maintained, through self-reporting studies of junior and senior high-school students, that middle and high-status juveniles have much higher rates than appear in official statistics of delinquency, while lower-status children, particularly if living in high delinquency areas, have a much higher probability of being discovered and adjudicated as delinquents.[30]

As some authors have suggested, the fact that so much crime occurs without ever becoming known to the authorities is partially a result of something less than 100 per cent efficiency in law enforcement. This is understandable, for only in a completely totalitarian society could law enforcement be completely efficient. No such society has ever existed, nor would we want it. Further, as Wallerstein and Wyle suggest, these studies, partial and limited as they may be, show that people can commit delinquencies and adult crime, and still be respectable businessmen, clergymen, teachers, housewives and parents. If it is true that so many of us have at one time or another committed some criminal offense, then a retributive and negative attitude towards those who have been caught is not only illogical, it is hypocritical as well.

These studies also indicate that a community's definitions of crime and delinquency are indeed nebulous. The decision that someone has committed a crime may depend less on the individual's behavior than on police policy, referral practices and treatment resources in a community. Enforcement procedures vary greatly by circumstance, social class, time and place. We do well to remember that the person who escapes detection, arrest, conviction and penal sentence escapes much more. He is saved from a social stigma that is not readily overcome. All too often, the sting of that stigma so affects a juvenile soon to become a man that he fulfills the prophecy of the delinquent label because he cannot wash it off.

The Measurement of Crime: Recorded Offenses

If a tree falls and no one hears it, the tree has nonetheless fallen. Similarly, we recognize that many crimes occur but are not recorded, and even of those recorded, our knowledge is incomplete.

As we have said, police records published in Uniform Crime Reports are the best source for measuring the amount of crime. But here we must emphasize that the data contained in these Reports are under two headings which reflect two levels of public knowledge -- first, "offenses known to the police," and second, "offenses cleared by arrest." Between these two categories there exists a vast gap. For as is well known, merely because someone complains to the police that an offense has occurred does not guarantee discovery of the offender. Only when offenders are taken into custody, are we able to say anything in a statistically analytic way about the attributes of offenders in general.

In other words, in setting out to analyze juvenile delinquency, we must use the group of offenses that have resulted in the arrest of juveniles; we can only speculate about the offenses committed by juveniles not arrested. The same must be said about our analyses of the sex and race of offenders.

In Uniform Crime Reports, "Cleared by arrest" does not mean that the offender is cleared, or exonerated. It means that a reported offense is "cleared" from the police record, the police having taken into custody at least one suspect who is available for prosecution. Satisfied that the person taken into custody is a good suspect, the police can clear their record of concern for that offense.

The proportion of offenses cleared by arrest has been fairly constant over many years, as has been the percentage cleared by type of offense. These figures are important for an understanding of some complexities relating to the race, age or sex of offenders, and it is for this reason that we draw attention to them now.

In the United States in 1960, a typical year, we are told that 26 per cent of all offenses known to the police were cleared by arrest.[31] Variations (rounded) among the index offenses are striking: murder and non-negligent manslaughter had a clearance rate of 92, forcible rape 73, robbery 39, aggravated assault 75, burglary 29, larceny 20, and auto theft 26. The offenses with the lowest clearance rates are the ones most frequently committed. Consequently, the average clearance rate for these seven offenses is only between 25 and 30 per cent. Figures for other offenses are not given; but for these important crimes, used to measure the volume of crime in general, we have but a small sample from which to make judgments about persons arrested. That is, about 70-75 per cent of offenses are not cleared, leaving us with no knowledge of the offenders. Whether we can safely project from the one-fourth sample to the total group is only conjecture.

The problem of projection is further complicated by the uneven rate of clearance among the seven offenses from which the 30 per cent sample comes. Acts commonly designated as "offenses against the person" -- murder, rape, aggravated assault -- have relatively high rates of clearance, while "offenses against property" -- burglary, larceny, auto theft -- have relatively low rates. The variance is understandable: when the act requires contact with the victim, there is a greater likelihood of identifying the criminal than when property is stolen without the victim's presence.

Moreover, the ratio of police investigatory teams to cases involving the person, particularly criminal homicide, is much greater than the ratio of staff to complaints regarding property. Finally, in many cases of bodily injury, if not most, the victim and offender were known to one another. Homicide, for example, is one of the most personalized of crimes, usually involving a relative, mate, close friend or at least acquaintance. The domain of probable suspects is therefore much more limited than in purely property crimes where offender and victim are commonly strangers.

Robbery, we may note, has a clearance rate about half way between the two major groups of offenses and statistically reflects the anomalous character of the crime, which is mainly acquisitive but does involve at least a personal confrontation and intimidation, if not always a personal injury.

In general, then, we see that in cases known to the police, arrests result from about three-fourths of offenses against the person and from only about one-fourth of offenses against property.

Quite the contrary percentages occur when we examine the proportion found guilty among the persons charged. The shift of base from "offenses" to "offenders" is significant. An offense may be "cleared by arrest" when one or more suspects are taken into custody; and one suspect may clear up one or more offenses. More specifically, one burglary may bring the arrest of three suspects; contrariwise, one arrested suspect may be responsible for three burglaries.

Thus, the relationship between number of persons and number of offenses, is never entirely clear. We do know that in 1960, of every 100 index offenses known to the police, 26 were cleared by arrest and 20 persons were charged. Of every 100 persons charged, or held for prosecution, 76 were found guilty. The following table summarizes these data from Uniform Crime Reports for 1960.

	Per Cent of Offenses Known to Police		Per Cent of Persons Charged **

As we have observed, the rates of clearance by arrest are higher for offenses against the person than for offenses against property. But when we examine the proportion of persons found guilty, the opposite is true -- that is, the probability of being arrested for a property offense is low, but if arrested, the probability of being convicted is relatively high. And while the probability of being arrested for an offense against the person is high, the probability of being convicted after arrest is relatively low. It is of special interest that offenses against the person comprise a very small percentage of all seven offenses. If robbery is considered a property offense, only 8. per cent are against the person. The following table shows these distributions.

Various deficiencies and limitations of these data have been discussed elsewhere in detail.[32] We are not here concerned with such matters as the classification system, the meaning of physical harm, attempted crimes, the lack of weighting for seriousness. What does concern us is the meaning of these data in examining the relationship between race and crime. An understanding of the foregoing material is critical to that meaning.

THE CONVERGENCE OF RACE AND CRIME -- THE STATISTICS AND THEIR MEANING

We are at that point in our analysis where we must determine the extent of overlap between two poorly conceived terms -- namely, "race" and "crime."

Man, as we have seen, is genetically blended and, from a racial standpoint, largely a product of cultural environment. So it is virtually impossible to determine the extent of genetic variations or, more particularly, the extent to which genetic variations operate to produce certain conduct. Genetic validity, as we also have noted, is sacrificed to social utility when we lump individuals together according to observed color for classification by race.

Crime, too, is a word charged with uncertain meaning, ranging from murder to disturbing the peace. Thus, when we use terms like Negro, white, or Puerto Rican as if they were racially clearcut, and when we also speak of crime as if that term were understood by everyone in the same sense, we are compounding confusion by faulty assumptions. Added to these distortions of reality is the suspicion that the variables of white or colored may not be crucial to our understanding of why people deviate from a set of legal norms.

Statistical Gaps

Studies of self-reporting of crime by persons who were never arrested have shown a more even distribution by social class than do official crime statistics. Mabel Elliott, in referring to a study of college students, suggests an explanation: "The major distinction between the delinquent behavior of college students and the cases brought into court seemed to lie in the relative immunity accorded the students because they belonged to a more favored group. College students represented a higher economic and social level, their family backgrounds were more stable, and their post-delinquent behavior was not followed by social ostracism which seems to incline the institutionalized offender to further delinquencies and misconduct."(33) That proportionately fewer Negroes than whites are college students or come from stable family backgrounds is obvious to any observer. The fact that social-class differences begin to disappear in studies of committed but nonrecorded offenses, raises serious questions about interpreting the racial distribution of offenders arrested by the police.

Moreover, official data in Uniform Crime Reports do not include federal offenses nor, more importantly for our purposes, what Edwin Sutherland called "white collar crime" -- mainly offenses committed by businessmen in the pursuit of their occupations. Long before the famous "electrical conspiracy" of 1961,(34)

Sutherland analyzed a number of corporations and said that all our statistics on crime were incomplete and misleading because they almost completely ignored the high rate of lawbreaking among the leading business and professional groups.(35) He argued that arrests, convictions and punishments had been reserved principally for the lower economic and social classes.

Sutherland examined 70 of the 200 largest manufacturing, mining and mercantile corporations in America, and 15 power and light corporations. The findings revealed an amazing picture of lawlessness in big business, such as restraint of trade and misrepresentation in advertising, infringement of patents, trademarks and copyrights, unfair labor practice, financial fraud and violation of trust. The 70 corporations had received 980 decisions against them for illegal activities, with the number of violations ranging from one to 50. The average for all corporations was 14. Most (84 per cent) were not brought to the criminal courts, but Sutherland maintained that all of the cases tried by the civil courts or other agencies were truly criminal.

We cannot recount here the character of all these criminal violations. Suffice to say that the social harm to the community, the amount of corporate theft and loss to the consumers, the actual damage to life and health through violations of food and drug laws, the volume of financial fraud suffered by society, all amounted to many times the loss incurred by common law offenses such as burglary, robbery or larceny. Yet these white collar crimes are not recorded in the national crime index.

These facts have led some writers to suggest that the man who steals a wallet lands in jail; but if he steals a railroad, he may become not only wealthy but respected for his business acumen, and politically powerful enough to retain his immunity. That the victims of most white collar crime, as compared to common law offenses, are impersonal and diffused, and that we have a social system in which corporate crime can function, partially explain the absence of such crime from official statistics.

Neither Sutherland nor other criminologists are indicting our whole economic structure, nor do they ignore the concerted efforts of business to regulate itself and of government to enforce restrictions. The point is, however, that most corporate crime reflects not only the color of the collar but of the skin as well, and neither becomes part of the arrest statistics available for analysis by race.

Crime Rate of Negroes

In Uniform Crime Reports there is no definition of race. Breakdowns are presented under the headings of white, Negro, Indian, Chinese, Japanese, all others (including unknown). Our presumption is that the designation of race is similar to that used by the Bureau of the Census mentioned previously. Now, if a careful, detached scholar knew nothing about crime rates but was aware of the social, economic and political disparities between whites and Negroes in the United States, and if this diligent researcher had prior knowledge of the historical status of the American Negro, what would be the most plausible hypothesis our scholar could make about the crime rate of Negroes? Even this small amount of relevant knowledge would justify the expectation that Negroes would be found to have a higher crime rate than whites. And the data at hand readily confirm this hypothesis.

The Uniform Crime Reports statistics reveal that, generally and proportionately, Negroes are arrested between three and four times more frequently than are whites. In 1960, for example, the rate for all offenses per 100,000 of the population was 2,101 for whites and 7,712 for Negroes (computed from UCR 1960, p. 95, using city population arrest figures). Using the 1950 Uniform Crime Reports, H. E. Barnes and N. K. Teeters recently computed the arrest ratios for Negroes and whites, which have probably remained substantially the same in more recent years. The table below groups the disparity of rates between whites and Negroes into "High Ratio Offenses," where the disparity is especially noticeable, "Medium Ratio Offenses," with the disparity somewhat less, and "Low Ratio Offenses," with the disparity still less but present.[36]

Reproduced from Harry E. Barnes and Negley K. Teeters, New Horizons in Criminology, 3rd Edition, N.Y: Prentice-Hall, 1959, p. 173.

These types of data are reproducible in most local, state and national arrest statistics, from the old study of the Chicago Commission on Race Relations in 1919[37] up to the 1960's. An examination of many studies in cities throughout the country, over time spans and by specific offenses, by age, sex and race, shows consistently that Negro adult crime and juvenile delinquency rates, measured by arrests, are higher than the white rates.[38]

The same conclusion may be drawn from judicial and prisoner statistics, which show Negroes with much higher rates of conviction and imprisonment than whites. We have had no satisfactory national judicial statistics in the United States, but according to individual studies, mostly localized, convictions of Negroes come to three to four times their proportion in the population. From reports in National Prison Statistics, Negroes comprise about one-third of all prisoners, although they form only one-tenth of the U.S. population.[39] With monotonous regularity in methodologically well-designed studies of delinquency, from Shaw and McKay in Chicago to Lander in Baltimore, (40-41) and in many less capably performed analyses, the disparity between white and Negro rates of juvenile delinquency have been duly spread before the community of scholars and of citizens.

Crime Rates of Other Groups

Much is said, but very little research has been written about Mexican-Americans in Southern California and Puerto Ricans, especially in New York City. Lemert and Rosberg found among convictions that the felony rates per 100,000 male Mexicans (356) in Los Angeles County were somewhat higher than the white rate (248) but lower than the Negro rate (835). But when corrections were made for age and sex, the Mexican rate was proportionately lowered (843 per 100,000 males aged 18-39 years), so that it approximated the white rate (716). Indians (2,540) had a rate three times that of Negroes (when computed per 100,000 male population); Japanese consistently had the lowest rates among all the ethnic groups.[42]

In a more recent study of 8,615 juveniles referred to the Los Angeles County Probation Department for delinquent acts in 1956, Eaton and Polk reported that the rate for Mexican-American boys (2,941) was only slightly higher than that for Negro boys (2,594) and over three times that for Anglo-white boys (851). In many respects, including socio-economic status, the Mexican-Americans were similar to Negroes. But those Mexican-American juveniles were over-represented in drug violations compared to both Negroes and whites; nearly 50 per cent of Mexican-American offenses were petty violations.[43] Using probation and conviction rates as a measure of criminal deviation is, however, invalid procedure. These rates are, more accurately, a measure of how often members of ethnic groups become involved in the law enforcement machinery.

Reports on delinquency among Puerto Rican juveniles in New York City do not confirm a widespread assumption of high rates. Clarence Senior, a leading authority on the Puerto Rican population on the mainland and in Puerto Rico, has reported that "Puerto Ricans form 8 per cent of the population and their share of the crime rate is only slightly more than 8 per cent."[44] Moreover, in a comparison between the proportion of the Manhattan juvenile population which was Puerto Rican (25 per cent) and the proportion given in the 20th Annual Report of the Children's Court of New York City (27 per cent), it appeared that the Puerto Rican juvenile was not over-represented.[45] Puerto Rican delinquency was described as "of a milder type," such as ungovernability or truancy, while burglary and gang activities involving felonious assault and homicide were much less frequent than among non-Puerto Ricans.

Finally, a study in New York City Schools found that in two Manhattan school districts, the court appearances for Puerto Rican children was 12 per 1,000 pupils, compared with 14 per 1,000 for non-Puerto Ricans. "Like other children," the report concluded, "Puerto Rican children tend to become about as good or about as bad as the children or youth with whom they associate."[46]

Beneath the Findings

Our task for the moment is neither to recount or review, nor even to appraise these reports. We are interested in analyzing what may be some of the factors which underlie the uniform findings, what the statistics may tell us beyond the fact of the differential rates.

What can be said beyond the oft-repeated assertion that white bias by the community, the police, prosecutors, judges and juries accounts for most of the higher rate of Negroes in criminal statistics? The assertion may very well be true, but despite the many documented individual cases of such discrimination, there is practically no verified, methodologically adequate scientific research to prove that this kind of bias actually causes the disparity in rates, or that elimination of administrative or judicial bias would eliminate the disparity. Research on the topic, while admittedly difficult to perform, is sorely needed. Meanwhile, the unbroken sequence of untoward experiences in the life history of American Negroes, Puerto Ricans and Mexicans supports the assumption that bias affects disparity.

In their provocative discussion of race and crime, Korn and McCorkle refer, as we have noted earlier, to the estimates of Herskovits about the frequency distribution of mixed and pure Negroes in the United States. On the basis of these estimates and the fact that race is quantitative and relative rather than qualitative and absolute, they make a suggestion that is theoretically compelling in theory but impossible in practice because the data are unattainable. Racially mixed persons in the United States, they remind us, include some who are almost totally white (seven-eighths white ancestry), some predominantly white, and some one-half white. These authors contend that "any valid racial study of criminality should apportion the criminality of these groups under both white and Negro categories. Thus, in figuring the totals of white and Negro offenders, unmixed whites and unmixed Negroes would count as one (1.0) for each racial category; every person seven-eighths white would add 0.875 to the white and 0.125 to the Negro categories; each person three-quarters white would add 0.75 to the white and 0.25 to the Negro categories; the equally mixed, 0.5 to each category, etc."[47]

Recalling that according to Herskovits, about 40 per cent of persons classified as Negroes are more white than Negro or at least half white, and claiming there is no evidence that Negro criminals are more or less mixed than Negroes in the general population,[48] Korn and McCorkle suggest that almost 40 per cent of the offenders contributing to the total of "Negro" crime are either half or more than half white. "Any correction," they conclude, "of the totals of Negro offenders toward greater conformity with this genetic distribution would have the effect of redistributing a very considerable number of criminals from the Negro to the white side of the ledger. The percentage 'transferred' by this procedure would be large enough to reduce the presently 'unfavorable' picture of Negro crime drastically."[49]

Such a procedure would be genetically more valid than the present system of attributing white and Negro racial factors to criminal behavior. But we are still faced with the social definition, which classifies anyone with any known Negro ancestry or apparent Negro characteristics as a Negro. To paraphrase W. I. Thomas, if a social group is defined as Negro, it is Negro in its consequences.

One of the consequences, as we have noted, is the greater probability of being arrested. No one really knows whether Negroes, as socially defined, commit more crime than whites, but we do know that, according to official police statistics, more persons with the designated status of Negro than with the status of white are arrested. The validity of the data is open to question on grounds we have mentioned, but if arrest statistics are poor indicators of the amount or kinds of crime generally, they are probably even more unreliable for determining the amount of Negro crime.

One of the reasons is that arrest statistics understate crime rates of both whites and Negroes, but most probably more for whites. To understand why, recall that in 1960, 92 per cent of the crime index offenses in Uniform Crime Reports were property offenses, and only 8 per cent were offenses against the person. These distributions are consistent over time. Yet, as we have seen, only 26 per cent were cleared by arrest, so that about three-fourths of these crimes never resulted in identification of the offender's race. Offenses against the person have relatively high clearance rates of around 75 per cent, in contrast to around 25 per cent for property crimes. Because the Negro arrest rate is much higher for crimes against the person, the likelihood that the offender's race will be known is higher among those very offenses which Negroes are more likely to commit.[50]

In the case of criminal homicide, about nine out of every 10 offenses are cleared by arrest and we can feel secure about our knowledge of the race distribution; but in cases of burglary, larceny, and auto theft, less than three out of 10 yield information about the offender's race. For these latter crimes our sample is more highly select and smaller, and it is very doubtful that we can assume the same race distribution. It is among the much larger number of uncleared property offenses that an hypothesis suggesting a higher proportion and rate of white than of Negro offenders would be most plausible.

Criminal Homicide, Rape and Riots

We have thus far raised questions about systematic errors in the information available on crimes known and persons arrested. We have refrained from drawing the common inference that the police practice discrimination in making arrests, mainly because of the lack of adequate research indicating to what extent the crime rates of Negroes would be diminished if there were no differential treatment at the police level.

However, one question on which research does cast some light is whether the fear oft-expressed among whites of being victimized by non-white criminals is justifiable. In most cases, the race of the victim compared to the race of the offender is not known. Even among the relatively small sample of property offenses which result in arrest, no criminal statistics are published about this kind of victim-offender relationship. However, for two particular types of assaultive crimes, homicide and rape, there are some useful and consistent data. It is unfortunate that we do not have more information about offenses like robbery, which would be of larger numerical concern. But surely from the viewpoint of gravity, death and rape are more disastrous and of more social consequence.

National and official crime statistics do not provide data, but enough research has been conducted to permit the definite statement that criminal homicide, like most other assaultive offenses, is predominantly an intragroup, intraracial act. In a detailed five-year study of homicides in Philadelphia (1948-1952), it was noted that in 516, or 94 per cent, of the 550 identified relationships, the victim and offender were members of the same race.[51] Hence, in only 34, or 6 per cent, of these homicides did an offender cross the race line: 14 were Negro victims slain by whites, and 20 were whites slain by Negroes. The ratio of same-race (intraracial) to different-race (interracial) homicide was as high as 15 to 1. In terms of rates per 100,000 population it is interesting to note that while Negro offenders (1.0) crossed the race line more often than did whites (.2), Negroes were victims (.7) of white offenders approximately three times more frequently than were whites (.2) of Negro offenders. These are criminal homicides as recorded in police reports. If justifiable homicides (14 during the five years in Philadelphia) were included, the total of interracial homicides would be somewhat larger, for 12 persons slain by white police officers were Negroes while two were whites.

Summarizing other research, Sutherland noted that "in crimes of personal violence the victims and the offender are generally of the same racial group, and have residence not far apart. Negroes murder Negroes, Italians murder Italians, and Chinese murder Chinese."(52) The amount of interracial homicide and the relative frequency of whites and Negroes in crossing the race line vary slightly in different parts of the country, but usually indicate that more whites slay Negroes than vice versa. Speaking primarily about the South, Porterfield says that "whites kill many more non-white men than vice versa, probably five times as many. A Negro does not dare to kill a white man as a rule. The consequences are too painful; but probably four-fifths of Negro homicide victims are struck down by members of their own race."(53)

H. C. Brearley refers to the fact that mortality data from the Office of Vital Statistics on causes of death give no information regarding interracial slayings: "If, obviously, the Negro is more often slain by whites than he, himself, slays a white victim, his homicide death rate is not an accurate index of his tendency to commit deeds of violence. Little evidence upon this point is available, for the death certificates upon which all homicide rates are based give information concerning the slain only."[54] He points out that in New York City during 1925, 68 Negroes were feloniously killed, of whom 20 were not slain by Negroes; and in South Carolina, of a total of 89 interracial homicides, 32 whites were killed by Negroes, and 57 Negroes by whites.[55]

A few earlier studies report on the race of victims and offenders. In Memphis, Tennessee, during 1923, F. L. Hoffman found seven Negroes killed by whites, and only two whites by Negroes.[56] A.A. Bruce and P.S. Fitzgerald, referring to the same city between 1920 and 1925, during which time there were 379 known cases, said that 3 per cent were whites slain by Negroes, in contrast to 13 per cent Negroes killed by whites.[57] In Chicago, a survey for 1926-1927 showed that white males killed 14 per cent of all colored male victims, and colored males were responsible for 12 per cent of all white male victims.[58] that 9 per cent of the homicides were interracial, of which the victims were 6 per cent Negro and 3 per cent white.[59] In a report by A. C. Meyers on 212 criminal homicides in St. Louis from 1949 to 1951, only six cases, or less than 3 per cent were interracial.[60] And in an unusual sociological study of aggravated assaults, D. J. Pittman and William Handy found that of the 238 cases which represented a one-quarter sample in St. Louis in 1961, only 10 cases, or 4 per cent were interracial.[61]

Howard Harlan found that of the 500 consecutive criminal homicides committed in Birmingham, Alabama, during the period from January 1937 to December 1944, less than 3 per cent crossed race lines.[62] This is considerably less than the 6 per cent in the Philadelphia study. But in Birmingham as in Philadelphia, female offenders never crossed race lines when killing females. Furthermore in Birmingham, all interracial offenses were among males, but in Philadelphia, females were involved both as victims and as offenders.

From these studies it should be clear that if whites are afraid that Negroes are likely to attack and slay them, the fear is not supported by what we know about interracial crime. Most of the evidence suggests the contrary, that Negroes are more likely to be killed by whites. And certainly any fear among white women of being slain by Negro men should be dispelled by examining the real world. Not only does the evidence we have show an equal number of Negro women slain by white men, but of the three white victims, two were prostitutes and had long criminal records, while of the three Negro victims, none had a criminal record. Moreover, only three cases of each type occurred in a community of two million population over a five-year period. It also may be of interest that all three of the Negro offenders were convicted of first degree murder, one being sentenced to death and the others to life imprisonment. Of the three white offenders, one was sent to a mental hospital and had no trial, one was still awaiting trial at the time of the study, and the third received a two-year county prison sentence for voluntary manslaughter.(63)

It is clear from many reports and research over the years that the non-white population has a rate of committing homicide that sometimes and in some places exceeds the white rate by three, four and even 10 times.(64) What is often overlooked by the non-research community is that these crime rates vary considerably within each racial group by community and region. Referring to general homicide death rates, Sutherland pointed out that "the high crime rates in the Southern states are generally interpreted as due to the large number of Negroes, but it is evident that homicides, at least, cannot be explained so simply, for the death rate by homicide for white persons in the South is approximately five times as high as in New England."(65)

This same generalization seems to be borne out when the Philadelphia data are compared with material collected by Harlan[66] in Birmingham, where the white offender rate (5.8) was over three times higher than the white offender rate in Philadelphia (1.8).

In a concise analysis of homicide death rates by racial and regional groups, George Vold[67] said that the homicide rates for the New England States are generally low partly because the colored population there is very small. But Vold also cautioned:

> Lest anyone conclude...that regional differences in homicide are equivalent to, or due only to, differences in the proportions of the total population classed as other than white, attention is invited to the similar consistent and large differences in the rates as between regions for the white group alone.
> When comparisons are made between the state of Massachusetts and Georgia, the following will be found to obtain: The homicide rate of the white group in Georgia (5.6) is almost exactly four times as high as that of the white group in Massachusetts (1.4); the Georgia 'other than white rate' (47.1) is likewise almost exactly four times the 'other than white' rate (11.8) for Massachusetts. This basic regional or sectional difference must be recognized and taken account of, independent of, and in spite of, the obviously important differences between the several major racial groups.[68]

Although no exhaustive attempt has been made in this present analysis to examine regional differences in the racial complexion of homicide, a few additional comments may be pertinent.

Returning to Birmingham and Philadelphia as examples of segregated and relatively unsegregated communities, Harlan found that 85 per cent of the 492 offenders were Negro, and that this race comprised 40 per cent of the Birmingham population.[69] In sum, the proportion of Negro offenders in criminal homicide was twice the proportion of Negroes in the general population. But in Philadelphia, 75 per cent of the offenders were Negro, although this race made up only 18 per cent of the population. Thus, in Philadelphia, Negroes contributed four times their expected "share" of offenders. In this type of comparative analysis, which describes Negro killings within the context of a Northern city on the one hand, and a Southern city on the other, it appears at first that Negroes in their total settings are twice as homicidal in the North as in the South.

But when rates per 100,000 population are used in the comparison, both Negroes and whites in Birmingham appear to have committed criminal homicide more often than the respective races in Philadelphia. The general criminal homicide rate in Birmingham (23.4) was over four times higher than that for Philadelphia (5.7). In the Southern city the Negro victim rate (49.0) and the offender rate (48.0) were approximately twice as high as the rates for Philadelphia Negroes (22.5; 25.6). In Birmingham, white victim and offender rates (5.8) were three times greater than those for Philadelphia whites (1.8; 1.9).[70] Hence, in order to determine propensity to commit criminal homicide, the rate per population unit is necessary.

Rape is one other type of offense in which the relationship between victims and offenders is an important aspect, but unfortunately little research has ever been done on it. Like homicide and other assaults, rape is overwhelmingly intraracial and intragroup. Generally, the non-white arrest rate is three to four times higher than the white arrest rate.[71] D. R. Taft noticed this for 1927, as have many other writers up to T. Sellin in 1962.[72-78] J. T. McKeown, who related rates of rape with the proportion of Negroes in a community, contended that there was so much variation from year to year and from city to city that no conclusion could be justified regarding the association.[79]

It was at first suggested that Negro rape rates were high only in the South. E. B. Reuter showed that, for the first decade of the present century, Negroes accounted for 66 per cent of rapes in that region, but only 13 per cent in the North, a proportion about the same as the Negro population in the North. But more recently, other references -- for Philadelphia, Washington, California, Ohio and Michigan -- show more non-whites committing rape than they represent in these respective populations.(80-85)

Some reports suggest that Negroes commit rape less frequently than whites.(86-95) Most of the latter studies, however, have used prison statistics or selected groups seen in clinics to which courts have made referrals. Perhaps Taft's conclusion comes closest to what most studies indicate -- that although the Negro is punished for rape far more than the white, his relative arrest rates for this crime are not excessive when compared with other offenses. The reason, he suggested, is that Negroes are often charged with rape if the victim is also a Negro.

In M. Amir's study of rape in Philadelphia for a two-year period, 1958 and 1960, the race of victim and of offender in each situation was noted, an aspect of research design rarely considered.(96) Of 616 cases of known relationships, 497, or 77 per cent, were Negro-Negro; 105, or 16 per cent, were white-white. Among the 44 cases in which the offender was of one race and the victim of another, 23, or 3.6 per cent, contained a white male offender and a Negro victim, and 21, or 3.3 per cent, had a Negro offender and a white victim. Once again, the amount of race crossing is small, and the danger to white women is as minimal as to Negro women -- probably much less if we stretch beyond officially recorded statistics and refer to the history of race relations from the days of slavery to recent times.

White males have long had a nearly institutionalized access to Negro women without much fear of reprisal or retribution. In the social tradition of the South, the reverse has always been considered anathema. In North and South alike (as well as East and West), there is probably greater white male accessibility to Negro girls through subterranean associations such as houses of prostitution, street walkers and call girls. Even with, or perhaps because of, these options of opportunity, there are numerically as many rapes of Negro women by white men as occur in the reverse relationship. One would expect in a society where the law, the police, and the courts are dominated by whites, that if immunity exists, if justice is not always equal, white rapists will be less frequently arrested and convicted. Aside from this reasonable assumption, the total amount of interracial rape recorded is quite small.

We have been discussing crime committed under conditions that exist in the normal functioning of society, for this is what most people have in mind when they raise questions about race and crime. But at least a parenthetical note should be added about the death and destruction that occur during riots in which

Negroes are involved. Most of the early labor riots, in which private industrial, mining and railroad police took the law into their own hands, involved whites on both sides. Lynchings of yesteryear are too well documented to mention here. Yet the three major interracial disorders deserve recall.(97)

The first was in East St. Louis in 1919. A church bell's ringing brought Negroes together in defense against an anticipated major attack from whites, who had been inflamed by the heavy influx of "cheap Negro labor" into the area. In the end, an investigating committee found nine whites and 25 Negroes known dead but noted that other Negroes had probably been consumed in flames. The estimates of damage ran to over $3 million.

Next, a month later, a Negro boy slipped across an unseen Chicago line separating the races on the bathing beach at 29th Street and Lake Michigan. After he climbed onto a raft in the white section, rocks were thrown and the Negro boy was drowned. The sequence of recriminations is a bloody tale of riot ending with the death of 15 whites and 23 Negroes.

The third disaster occurred in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in 1921. A white mob, apparently enraged by the determination of some Negroes to protest a threatened lynching, engaged in a mass assault upon the Negro section, most of which was burned during the course of extended rioting. It is not clear exactly how many persons were killed, but some reports listed 25 whites and 60 Negroes. Property damage was enormous, a square-mile area of Negro concentration being almost completely destroyed.

Embroiled in such conflicts, Negroes have not been entirely peaceable, but down to, and including, the riots of our own day, the injuries inflicted on them by illegal acts of whites have surely exceeded the harm caused by Negro resort to violence.

From Police to Prison

In the annals of the administration of justice are many cases of improper treatment of Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Spanish-Americans and other minority groups. There is widespread belief that Negroes, particularly, are most frequently subjected to illegal arrest, arrest on weak suspicion, illegal detention and corporal handling by the police. They are jailed more than bailed. Beyond white proportions, they are convicted with little evidence and sentenced to more severe punishments of long duration.

Individuals and organizations concerned with these problems can readily cite illustrative cases testifying to the presence of these deficiencies in our democracy. Yet, keenly sensitive to criticism, and unreceptive to analysis by persons outside their cohesive ingroup, the police and the judiciary have rarely been methodically examined by social scientists armed with hypotheses of discrimination. Moreover, there are presently no national judicial statistics available as basic documents for research on regional and other variations in conviction and sentencing practices. The data at hand come mostly from selective experience and local studies, some of which are especially useful for specific details or statistical analyses. (98-110)

Many cities throughout the country have produced reports concerned with the differential administration of justice, from the police to the prisons. The objective observer can only conclude that a legal system theoretically designed to provide uniform or equal treatment of suspects and defendants has faltered. Although scientific analysis of race bias and discrimination in the differential handling of whites and Negroes is badly needed, we do not require a statistical treatment to reveal departures from what is conceived as correct legal procedure. Instances of violence by police and the arrest of Negroes with less evidence than is required to arrest whites have been sufficiently numerous to cause alarm among private agencies and government bodies whose functions are to keep watch over the rights of our citizens.

That brutality and illegal arrests are not the pattern but only the exception; that some whites have grievances similar to those of Negroes; that the poor of any ethnic group suffer disadvantage, having less ability to engage counsel, provide bail or pay fines, do not mitigate the situation. On the contrary; for the number of the poor and the uneducated within the white majority is tripled within the colored minority. Thus, even if there were no race bias in the administration of justice, the social and economic class system would itself carry a burden of blame for the lack of equal protection and uniformity of treatment. Fortunately the Supreme Court of the United States in the Gideon case has recognized one kind of disparity and is seeking to initiate corrective measures by requiring that defendants who cannot afford lawyers will nonetheless be represented by counsel.

Only a few references are cited here by way of illustration. Some are old, some new; but the story has remained essentially unchanged since Myrdal's classic study. He reported that, for the period 1920-1932, out of 479 Negroes killed by white persons in the South, 54 per cent were slain by white police officers.(111) The figures reach proportions that justify suspicion of unnecessary and unwarranted use of violence by white police officers.

H. Garfinkel, who examined 821 homicides in 10 counties of North Carolina between 1930 and 1940, concluded that proportionately fewest indictments were made when whites killed Negroes; most were made (94 per cent) when Negroes killed whites.(112) Of those charged with first degree murder, 28 per cent of the whites who killed Negroes, but only 15 per cent of the Negroes who killed whites, were acquitted. Of those convicted, none of the whites who killed Negroes received life imprisonment, but

10 per cent of the Negroes who killed whites did; and none of the whites who killed a Negro was sentenced to death, contrasted with 37 per cent of the Negroes who killed whites. The general attitude of the courts was that the slaying of a white by a Negro was almost prima facie evidence of guilt; of a white by a white required objective administration of justice; of a Negro by a Negro was just a routine affair deserving only moderate attention, and of a Negro by a white probably involved some mitigating circumstances like provocation.

In an equally useful research, G. B. Johnson studied 220 homicide cases in Richmond, Virginia, from 1930 to 1939, and 330 homicides in five counties of North Carolina from 1930 to 1940. There were five cases of whites killing Negroes, but not a single conviction, and 24 cases of Negroes killing whites, of which 22 resulted in conviction. Johnson also noted that of the 141 Negro-Negro homicides, not one resulted in the death penalty and only eight in life imprisonment; but of the 22 cases with Negro offenders and white victims, six concluded with a death sentence and seven with life imprisonment.(113)

The Civil Rights Act of 1875 clearly specified that no state could exclude anyone from jury service because of race, color or previous condition of servitude. Since then, there have been many court decisions affirming the illegality of anti-Negro discrimination in the make-up of grand and trial juries.

Although adequate protection exists in the law, there are many communities like Harris County, Texas, where, as W. S. Robinson pointed out, Negroes made up 20 per cent of the population and 10 per cent of those paying poll tax; yet, from 1931 to 1938, only 18 Negroes were summoned for grand jury duty, and only five Negroes were among the 384 persons who served.(114) There are places where no Negroes were ever called to jury duty. Doubtless a rare exception, even in the North, is Philadelphia, where the representation of Negroes on juries is about double their proportion of the population -- a situation most likely due to their readiness, in contrast to the reluctance of whites, to accept jury service. In Los Angeles County, where many Mexicans and Mexican-Americans are processed through the courts, the situation may today be improved; but up to 1945, E. M. Lemert reported that according to available data there had never been a Mexican member of the grand jury.(115)

If Negroes are more likely to be convicted, especially when involved in interracial offenses, are they also likely to receive more severe and longer sentences? Not all studies agree, for there is evidence that in some communities the sentences given to whites and to minority groups do not differ significantly; and there is other evidence that Negroes sometimes receive shorter sentences.

According to the previously cited work of Johnson and of Garfinkel, Negroes are more likely than whites to receive life imprisonment or death sentences in homicide cases. In a study of persons convicted of burglary and auto theft in Los Angeles County, most being first offenders and unskilled laborers, E. M. Lemert and J. Rosberg found more whites than Negroes given short sentences, and more Negroes than whites long sentences. The sentences and percentages were: four months' imprisonment or less, or probation -- 45 per cent of the whites, 27 per cent of the Negroes; four to nine months -- 42 per cent of the whites, 47 per cent of the Negroes; 10 to 12 months -- 13 per cent of the whites, 27 per cent of the Negroes.[116]

On the other hand, a study of over 1,400 cases handled without jury in the Philadelphia Court of Quarter-Sessions from 1956 to 1957, involving 21 different judges, revealed no racial differences in sentencing practices. In this analysis by Edward Green, Negroes numbered 1,092 and whites 333.[117] By using the minimum period served, he noted that about one-fourth of each race was sent to prison for 12 months or more; slightly more Negroes (34 per cent) than whites (28 per cent) received sentences of three to 11½ months; and equal proportions of each race (21 per cent) were sentenced to less than three months. Slightly more whites (20 per cent) than Negroes (13 per cent) received probation, more Negroes (5 per cent) than whites (2 per cent) were fined (mostly for gambling and liquor violations), and an equal per cent (3 per cent) had suspended sentences. When the sentences were compared by type of offense, age of offender, and previous criminal record, no significant race differences were noted. Some of the cases involved personal contact with the victim, but the victim-offender relationship was not examined in this study.

A review of national prisoner statistics shows that in most states Negroes are committed to prison longer than whites for the same types of offenses. However, the reverse is sometimes true. Sellin's review of these statistics for 1931-1932 showed that Negroes received a lower average sentence in "definite sentence" states, mostly Southern, for homicide, robbery, assault, forgery, larceny and liquor violations, but higher for rape, other sex offenses and burglary. In states with the indeterminate sentence, Negroes had longer sentences than whites for all major offenses.[118] Negroes also had more commitments to prison and served more actual time before release from state penal institutions. The average (median) number of months served before release among all states in 1951 was 25 for Negroes and 20 for whites. The disparity was greater in the Northeast (Negroes 30 months; whites 24 months) and in the West (Negroes 30; whites 19) than in the Northcentral states (Negroes 26; whites 21) or in the South (Negroes 21; whites 17).[119]

Combined with those facts is the knowledge that proportionately about 10 to 14 per cent more whites than Negroes are annually "released conditionally," that is, granted some form of parole, thus always leaving behind a greater number of Negroes among prisoners eligible for release. The increasing number of Negroes in our prisons partly stems from this differential pattern of release. Clearly we cannot use the racial composition of a prison population as an index to the amount of crime committed by different racial or ethnic groups.

Finally, when persons are sentenced to death, some have their sentences commuted to life imprisonment by a board of pardons or some similar agency. A fundamental question is whether these sentences of execution are carried out equally for whites and Negroes. Research gives a negative answer, indicating that over time and in different states, between 10 and 20 per cent more Negroes than whites are executed.(120) That whites have greater access to private legal counsel may partially contribute to their chances of having a death sentence reduced to life imprisonment.

It should be noted that there are occasions when members of minority groups who commit crimes are either ignored or treated very leniently by the police and courts. In some communities, the citizens as well as the police and judges have an attitude of "live and let live" as long as "they keep it among themselves." This attitude, when expressed by the assignment of fewer police officers to highly populated Negro neighborhoods, may mean that considerably less crime by Negroes is being recorded by the police than actually occurs. Whether such underreporting adds up to more or less than the under-reporting of white crimes is not known. Another result of this attitude is that Negro victims often are not receiving equal protection under the law, either by police surveillance or by conviction of the guilty. When white officers ignore or bypass Negro violations of sex, drinking and gambling laws, or dismiss intra-racial assaults as "typically Negro," they are probably contributing much to negative attitudes toward the law, to the reluctance of victims to make official complaints, and consequently to the crime rate of Negroes.

Some comment should be made about the police handling of juvenile cases that may partly explain what at first appears to be discriminatory treatment. In most large cities, juvenile-aid division officers are empowered to decide upon taking a juvenile into custody, whether to release him to his own parents as an "unofficial," "remedial" disposition of the case, or to turn him over to the juvenile court under an "official" or "arrest" disposition. Some studies have shown that juveniles from minority groups are more often arrested than given remedial action.(121) ¶ The contention by police and some social agencies is that the home of the juvenile is often an undesirable environment; by means of an official arrest, they can put him in the hands of persons who will interview, diagnose and help treat his problems. This rationale may be logical within a limited setting and policy of social action. But we cannot overlook what the official label of delinquency may do to a boy's image of himself and to his image in the eyes of the community. Nor can we overlook the underlying fact of the minority boy's less desirable home and neighborhood environment, and the social and cultural deprivations that caused them to be so.

Summary of the Statistics

This dissection of some criminal statistics has been necessary in order to consider them critically, to recognize their limitations and deficiencies. We do not know with certainty the actual amount of crime among whites, Negroes, Puerto Ricans or any other group. We do know that persons of all groups commit many offenses that are unrecorded. We cannot be sure of the degrees of seriousness of even the recorded crime without further study.[122] Only from arrests do we know the race of offenders, yet arrests in any year represent only about 30 per cent of the index crimes recorded. Among offenses for which non-whites as well as whites are arrested, crimes of homicide, rape and other assaultive acts represent a small proportion compared to drunkenness, gambling, disorderly conduct and other relatively minor offenses against the public order. Interracial assaults are rare and no more threatening to whites than to non-whites. In striking ways, the administration of justice appears to fail in affording equality of treatment, so fundamental to a democratic society.

The status "Negro," as Korn and McCorkle conclude, entails a greater risk of involvement with law-enforcement processes than does the status "white." The risk appears to increase at each stage of the enforcement process, from arrest to imprisonment. These same writers add: "A large but unknown portion of this higher rate of involvement with law enforcement must be attributed to distortions introduced into the statistics by differential legal and penal treatment of whites and Negroes. Until the extent of these distortions is known, there is no way of determining whether the higher Negro rate represents a higher rate of actual crime or a greater liability to involvement with law-enforcement agencies."(123)

High as the Negro criminal rate may be, many whites especially in our urban communities tend to exaggerate it. For example, in an interesting study of attitudes among a thousand white police officers in Philadelphia in 1952 (when integration of the police in that city was much less advanced than now), William Kephart found that when officers were asked what percentage of arrests in their districts were Negro, three out of four over-estimated the actual figures.(124) The higher the real Negro arrest rate, the greater was the over-estimation. At that time, Negroes comprised about 70 per cent of all persons arrested, but estimates by white officers averaged over 95 per cent.

The press has helped create distorted images of minority groups by sensationalizing the relatively rare instances of serious intergroup crimes. But these images also have been reinforced by the more visible and frequent appearance, particularly of Negroes, in the law enforcement chain from police to prison, from probation to parole. When a white probationer or parolee fails to conform to the rules of his release, especially if he commits a new crime, the public is unduly quick to criticize the whole system and philosophy of alternatives to imprisonment. If an unsuccessful parolee is also Negro, both the system and the race are often unjustly charged with failure, and the two are associated beyond proper proportion.

Reality always creates some kind of image; and, in reverse, an exaggerated image frequently promotes a corresponding change in reality. An image, like a prophecy, may have a self-fulfilling propensity. To project an image corrected by the reality of the relation between crime and race has been the purpose of this brief review.

SEEKING AN EXPLANATION

Our society has witnessed remarkable scientific growth and change since the beginning of the century. About half of us now marveling at satellites orbiting the earth were living before the first airplane was flown. Yet social change is sluggish. The Supreme Court decision on school desegregation did not come about until nearly a hundred years after the Civil War. And nearly 40 years ago Thorsten Sellin concluded a statistical note on Negro criminality that is still a valid commentary on the need to accelerate social change:

> Nothing ... points to a conclusion that the Negro's real criminality is lower or as low as the white's. The American Negro lacks education and earthly goods. He has had very little political experience and industrial training. His contact with city life has been unfortunate, for it has forced him into the most dilapidated and vicious areas of our great cities. Like a shadow over his whole existence lies the oppressive race prejudice of his white neighbor, restricting his activities and thwarting his ambitions. It would be extraordinary, indeed, if this group were to prove more law-abiding than the white, which enjoys more fully the advantages of a civilization the Negro has helped to create.

The assumption that the Negro presents the higher rate of real criminality is, therefore, no indictment of the Negro race. The responsibility lies where power, authority, and discrimination has its source, the dominant white group. To that group the existence of a high rate of crime among Negroes is a challenge which cannot be brushed aside by platitudes about "race inferiority," "inherited depravity," or similar generalizations. The only way to meet it is by a conscientious and determined search for the causes of crime in general and among Negroes in particular.(125)

The search for causes goes on, but while men of good science and of good will have long abandoned the concept of the "born criminal," of the "genetic" theory of crime, it is still necessary to remind some of our "law-abiding law-breakers" of this fact. There are still voices in the wilderness of ignorance or prejudice who contend that the non-white, by reason of his biology alone, is a predisposed criminal. A statement made by one group arguing this "genetic" position in 1963 reads as follows: "The enormously greater incidence of criminality on the part of Negroes is largely attributable to genetically determined racial differences in personality and behavioral traits."[126] Perhaps the comments by Korn and McCorkle are most clear and concise in response to such confused thinking.[127] They point out that heredity sets limits on what might emerge under different environmental conditions; that the environment seems to determine whether they will emerge, how they will emerge, and how they will be expressed in behavior. What we know about genetically determined traits suggests that they are specific; that is, we inherit hair and eyes of specific color and perhaps certain specific psychological potentialities. But criminal behavior is not specific, for there are almost as many kinds of crime as differences in behavior. If criminality were genetically determined, we should inherit specific tendencies for embezzlement, burglary, forgery, etc.; as would be required by Mendel's rule of inheritance of specific traits. If we inherited specific criminal forms of behavior, we would also have to inherit specific noncriminal occupations and be as destined to become a police officer as to have red hair.

Moreover, it cannot be argued that Negroes or whites or any group of people have personality and behavioral traits that genetically predetermine them toward general criminality. Not only does this position ignore the fact that the definition of crime is not stable over time or place, but it also fails to recognize that most criminals obey most laws. Most career criminals are extremely careful to obey most laws in order to avoid drawing police attention. A genetic theory would have to explain why criminals observe most laws and only break some laws sometimes.

Finally, the false genetic theory of crime is sometimes reduced to a contention that certain minority groups are by heredity impulsive, lazy, irresponsible, and that these traits lead to criminality. If so, we might ask, do not whites also inherit these traits? And how do we account for the fact that these traits sometimes lead to criminal conduct and other times to non-criminal lives? How do we account for the increasing appearance of non-whites in outstanding positions of social service, science, business and industry? Or for the fact that some white crime rates in certain parts of the country are three or four times higher than the white crime rates in other parts?

As we observed at the start, no genetic theory of crime is given credence by the community of scholars concerned with either crime or genetics. Criminal behavior is learned, and what is learned comes from experience with our surrounding environment. It is to that environment we must turn our attention.

When queried, most people who are not students of criminology will say that a person becomes a delinquent or criminal because of adverse conditions, such as poverty, poor education, unemployment, lack of parental supervision, deteriorization of moral values. The more sophisticated theories of criminologists also take cognizance of these factors, weaving them into a logical array of influences and ideas that seek to explain typical forms of crime and delinquency. An important point to keep in mind, therefore, is that instead of asking why a Negro becomes delinquent or criminal, we should ask why anyone does.

Among some of the most compelling writings on delinquency today are those of Albert Cohen, Richard Cloward and Lloyd Ohlin, and Walter Miller, who base many of their ideas on the early researches of Frederick Thrasher, Clifford Shaw and Henry McKay in Chicago and the sociological theory of Talcott Parsons and Robert Merton.(128) Although there are important differences among these writers, their dominant themes are similar: There are values in American society which emphasize the goals of (mostly material) success. Because the means to achieve these goals are not available to all in equal measure, many people fall prey to feelings of anxiety and despair which may be expressed in forms of deviance and delinquency. In one sense, delinquency and crime are conceived as normal responses to conditions of life that close the doors of opportunity. Delinquency becomes both a protest against the social system that blocks the path to success and a way, albeit illegitimate, to acquire recognition and status among equal sharers in the same subjected group. Difficult to find are the legitimate opportunities to success (education, good job, proper contacts); far more accessible are the illegitimate opportunities (theft, gambling, drugs) to obtain the symbols of success (car, property, power).

This approach to understanding crime means concerning ourselves with the physical and social conditions -- low income, unskilled occupation and unemployment, family disruption, poor education -- which prevent some groups even the minimal promises of the American Dream. Psychological aspects of this relative deprivation may involve frustration, serious damage to self-conception, and other personality disorders, for these social conditions engender not only of delinquency, but also disqualification and despair. The catalogue of crises in the life style of the culturally deprived has been abundantly described in scientific studies, essays and popular fiction. We need not review them here. It is clear, however, that while many whites suffer social disabilities, the visibility of the Negro, Puerto Rican, and Mexican-American, along with the weight of a history of prejudice, renders these groups more vulnerable to isolation and a diminished share in the economic, political and social life of the larger democratic community.(129)

In the large-scale efforts by the New York City Youth Board to predict delinquency, using the Glueck Social Prediction Table, the results thus far suggest that the same set of factors -- the type of supervision and discipline by mother, the degree of family cohesiveness -- are useful for predicting delinquency, whether among white, Negro or Puerto Rican youth.[130] With greater exposure to these deleterious conditions, it would not be surprising if Negroes displayed a higher crime rate. When white delinquents and non-delinquents are compared, differences in their backgrounds are similar to those observed when Negro delinquents are compared with Negro non-delinquents.

We cannot say with conclusiveness why some children in life's poorer circumstances become delinquent while others do not, for certainly not all homes in rundown neighborhoods, with missing parents, low incomes and crime in the streets produce delinquent juveniles. But these conditions are more likely to yield failure than success, to encourage children to drop out of school and into crime. Convinced that neither the child nor the adult freely chooses to become a criminal, we recognize that a society which does not provide sufficient acceptable alternatives to successful adjustment will encourage unacceptable ones.

The amount of mobility and family disorganization to many of the conditions noted above have also been associated with delinquency. Once again non-whites experience more of both. Many studies repeatedly find the same conclusion. One of these by Sidney Axelrod pointed out that among institutionalized children, only 18 per cent of the Negroes lived with both parents, compared with 46 per cent of the whites; and 85 per cent of the Negroes came from broken homes, compared with 50 per cent of the whites.[131] It was also disclosed that Negro children committed by the courts were younger, had committed less serious offenses, and had fewer previous court appearances than white children. There are certain occupational groups which are virtually free from recorded crime. These include professionals, managers and proprietors, who constitute about 20 per cent of the white labor force but only 5 per cent of the non-white. The highest proportion of offenders, both white and non-white, comes from unskilled laboring groups or the unemployed. There are three times as many non-whites as whites in the unskilled category, and at least twice as many unemployed.

As of 1960, the average (median) family income of whites ($5, 893) was nearly twice that of non-whites ($3,161), with the regional difference greatest in the South ($5,350 for whites; $2,322 for non-whites).[132] Furthermore, while the income gap was closing between 1940 and 1950, no progress seems to have been made between 1950 and 1960. In 1940, the average non-white's male's wage was 41 per cent of the average white male; by 1950, this had risen to 61 per cent, but the improvement stopped there. By 1960, the figure was only 60 per cent.[133]

Again, in the Philadelphia report, about one-third of whites, but less than one-fourth of the non-whites, had finished high school. As a matter of fact, about the same percentage of non-whites finished high school in 1960 as had whites in 1940, showing a 20-year lag in educational attainment. Fewer non-whites in that city had finished college in 1960 (3 per cent) than had whites in 1960 (6 per cent) or even in 1940 (4 per cent). Certainly this disparity is due to the greater difficulties of entering college than of staying in once admitted, for the drop-out rate of Negroes is low: In a national study, fewer than 10 per cent of Negro students failed to obtain a college degree while approximately 40 per cent of white students did not graduate.(134)

When all of these conditions are linked with segregation, particularly in highly deteriorated neighborhoods, they assume even greater weight as contributions to delinquency. Yet we have good reason to believe that it is not merely the concentration of Negroes that produces high rates of delinquency; as Lander has shown in his Baltimore study, neighborhoods with highest concentration had rates as low or lower than rates for whites throughout the city. And even in the highly congested, relatively segregated areas housing Puerto Ricans in New York City, the amount of delinquency is not high, as we have noted.(135)

Mozell Hill has summarized our thesis well: "Negroes who live in blighted areas suffer deeply from discrimination, rejection and lack of integration into the society. Juvenile delinquency among them is generated by this lack of integration rather than by processes of social disorganization. An increase in juvenile delinquency is likely to occur most frequently when and where aspirations of youth persist under conditions of limited and prescribed opportunities. Under such circumstances, access to success-goals by legitimate means is seldom available to Negro youth in cities. They do not have opportunities for internalization of acceptable and respectable norms of conduct."(136)

Although Negro leadership in the 1960's has taken vigorous action toward full membership in American society, the entire citizenry is needed. As Time expressed the matter with respect to crime: "...even heroic efforts by Negro leadership could only dent the Negro crime problem, because essentially it is a white problem. And it will remain a severe problem until Northern whites, private citizens as well as civic officials, recognize that Negro crime is basically a symptom of a failure in integration...."(137) Until the Negro is permitted more complete participation in the good life offered by a democratic society, tremendous human resources will continue to be lost because of earlier deaths, untrained capacities and chronic crime. Besides the impelling force of humanitarian motives, it is far costlier to the nation to perpetuate present conditions than to remove them.

CONCLUSION

Thrust any child, white or colored, from the womb to a world that offers the rewards of status and success. With a moat of discrimination cut him off from the mainland so that there are few or no opportunities to achieve those rewards. Let him continue to wish for the same things the mainlanders desire, but make him move around much more, lose a father to death or desertion and a mother to work and dependency. Give him less knowledge to absorb, less money than the mainlander receives for the same tasks. Surround him with examples of unlawful achievers, and make him fight to protect the mainland without fully participating in the rules to govern it. Shorten his length of life, expose him to disease, treat him as if he were biologically inferior and call him nasty names to convince him of it. Even if the mainlanders value the service he gives them and the feeling of importance his contrast offers, he is lost.

Fortunately the future is not lost, for a bridge is being built across the moat; the Revolution that won a new kind of liberty two centuries ago is still working its way through the 20th century. Solutions once foreclosed by fiat are now being sought and found in new, often unanticipated ways that affirm the dignity and worth of all men. Because we have always felt that one of the virtues of democracy is the abundance of alternatives, we are required to turn our attention to those who have known no abundance. And as we expand their choices of work and residence, travel and leisure, school and profession, we will reduce the inequity and increase participation. Although no firm preduction can be made, both changes should cause a decline in crime.

We are learning that while innate capacities are not equally distributed among whites or among non-whites, these traits can flourish and reach equal heights regardless of color.(138) Thus, Martin Jenkins writing in the Scientific Monthly, says that of 22,201 Negro subjects included in 13 studies, 0.3 per cent scored at I.Q. 140 and above, and fully 1 per cent scored at I.Q. 130 and above -- percentages similar to those obtained from a "normal" I.Q. distribution of American school children.(139)

Just as there is no way of knowing at present what the I.Q.'s would be if equal opportunity were given to all racial and social groups, there is no way of telling precisely what the crime and delinquency rates would be under similar circumstances. Some efforts have been made to equate the socio-economic status of lower-class whites with lower-class Negroes to determine whether differences in crime rates disappear; but even while noting that the differentials are slightly reduced, the authors admit that these efforts fail to account for the mental and emotional import of segregation and discrimination.[140] The group which is socially defined as Negro in the United States might well have test scores ahead, and crime rates below, those of whites if life's chances were equal for both groups. "I am sometimes surprised," says Sherwood Washburn, 1962 president of the American Anthropological Association, "to hear it stated that if Negroes were given an equal opportunity, their I.Q. would be the same as the whites! If one looks at the degree of social discrimination against Negroes and their lack of education, and also takes into account the tremendous amount of overlapping between the observed I.Q.'s of both, one can make an equally good case that, given a comparable chance to that of whites, their I.Q.'s would test out ahead."[141]

All in all, there is every reason to believe, on the basis of what is now known, that under comparable circumstances to those given whites, the Negro crime rate would not be substantially different from the white rate. Even Army trainees, with integration of the services, are not on a completly comparable basis because they must deal with society outside of military life. But within the military social system there is relatively equal treatment and equal opportunity for achieving status. Housing is integrated; men sleep, train, eat and strive together. Norms of conduct and role models are presented alike to Negroes and whites. Military authorities report that the offense rate since integration is lower for Negroes than for whites. Perhaps no better lesson for the future can be learned from the military social organization.[142]

The broad community-action programs now under way in many large urban areas are designed to improve housing through urban renewal, to upgrade education and occupation through new training activities, to strengthen physical health and family organization through extensive clinics and counseling. These, too, are forward steps that hopefully will reduce deviancy. We have been late in starting, for the seeds of deprivation have grown deep since slavery, and as Washburn has pointed out, the collective conscience is not always swiftly aroused or wisely directed. "The social conscience," he says, "is an extraordinary thing. A lynching stirs the whole community to action, yet only a single life is lost. Discrimination, through denying education, medical care, and economic progress, kills at a far higher rate. A ghetto of hatred kills more surely than a concentration camp, because it kills by accepted custom, and it kills every day in the year."[143] Removing these ghettos is part of the current phase of the American revolution. However, the aim of its leaders is not to drive out a dominant group; it is to join that group, to have admission in a middle class society that has been closed and that has imposed standards and restrictions without giving equal access to its benefits. As Franklin Frazer long ago announced, Negroes have accepted the common values of American society and wish simply to participate in them.

We can now afford to be more optimistic because we are coming to recognize that the forces leading to crime and delinquency are subject to control. A child is not destined to become delinquent, as is an acorn a tree. But there are forces that determine his chances for successful or stunted growth. The development of organized movements to increase the opportunities of all is an index of society's awareness of this difference between what Sheldon Glueck calls destiny and destination.(144)

But more than formal action of city, state and Federal administrations is needed. The informal, everyday experiences that increasingly afford opportunities to display a democracy of respect and treatment will do far more to aid the structured programs than even well-spent tax funds. As knowledge replaces misconceptions about race and crime, which is one area where better understanding is needed, another shadow over the mind will be lifted and men once separated can come together.

Dear Harry:

I have been so busy that I have not yet had a chance to read through Crime and Race, and have already missed your deadline for an order. We have, however, pretty well got out of the practice, if we were ever in it, of making large distributions of other agencies' publications -- it costs too much to distribute our own. I feel sure, however, that we will want to buy a quantity of 50 or so, and will do so whenever you begin taking orders. In the meantime, I shall read the manuscript as soon as I possibly can.

All the best.

Sincerely yours,

Dear Dr. Fineberg:

The news of your retirement as community relations consultant for the American Jewish Committee gives many people a welcomed opportunity. It is a chance to say thank you and to congratulate you on many years of accomplishment in the field of human relations.

Placing a period after twenty-five years of work well done must give you a good feeling. In your case retirement should most probably be punctuated with a comma, signifying a continuation of your work. It is good this is so. I hope retirement will find you only slightly busier than you are now.

Again, my congratulations for your past contributions and my best wishes for your continued efforts in behalf of the common good of all men.

Sincerely,

December 28, 1964

Dear Mr. Dunbar:

My retirement as community relations consultant of the American Jewish Committee was made a joyous occasion for me by the Executive Board, by the staff of AJC, and by my professional coleagues in other organizations, who sent me communications at John Slawson's suggestion. The letters handed to me at the Board meeting in Miami are a tremendous reward for my work as a rabbi and as a community relations worker. I want to thank you most heartily and also to convey Dr. Slawson's thanks.

It is most gratifying to have these encomiums from the professional heads of national and local Jewish, Protestant, Catholic and non-sectarian organizations and from so many others with whom it has been my good fortune to work during this past quarter of a century. Each of the nearly 200 letters deserves a personal reply. I wish that I had time to tell you how much your letter has fortified my desire to make some further contribution toward enhancing human relations. I pray that I may increasingly merit your esteem.

Although retirement terminates my work at AJC, my friends apparently expect me to remain active. It has become a habit that I shall try to retain. I hope to finish a book on the strategy of human relations, to do other writing, to lecture, and to serve as a free lance human relations consultant. The high regard, expressed in your letter, and the many memories of experiences I have shared with you will provide inspiration and incentive for this new career.

Sincerely yours,

With many thanks
and all good wishes,

Peddlers of Hate

A series of articles on organized bigotry in the United States.

"GIVE LIGHT AND THE PEOPLE WILL FIND THEIR OWN WAY"

JACK STEELE, one of America's most distinguished Washington correspondents, has achieved a reputation as a reporter who digs deep—and persistently—for facts. For his expose of "five-percenters" in government he was awarded the Raymond Clapper Memorial Award by President Truman in 1950, as well as the Sigma Delti Chi citation for Washington reporting. The American Newspaper Guild's Heywood Broun Award was presented to him for his expose of corruption in the Reconstruction Finance Corp.

"PEDDLERS OF HATE," the series reprinted in this booklet, has already been widely acclaimed. Sen. Irving Ives (R., N. Y.) entered the initial articles in the Congressional Record. Sen. Harley M. Kilgore (D., W. Va.) hailed the series on the Senate floor as a "great public service in the finest traditions of American journalism." House Democratic Leader John W. McCormack (Mass.) called "Peddlers of Hate" "one of the most constructive pieces of newspaper work I have seen in many years." The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith termed it "a valuable community service for which Mr. Steele and the Scripps-Howard Newspapers deserve commendation and thanks." The Interfaith Movement, in praising the articles, stated that they "should be welcomed by all thinking Americans."

Peddlers of Hate

Bigotry Again On the March In America

By JACK STEELE,
Scripps-Howard Staff Writer.

WASHINGTON, May 2.—Organized bigotry is on the upswing in the United States.

Professional hatemongers, ranging from cynical racketeers to hysterical zealots, again are doing a thriving business.

Jack Steele

Scurrilous venom sheets and pamphlets are flooding the mails and turning up, often unsolicited, on breakfast tables and businessmen's desks throughout the country.

Hawkers of hate are capitalizing on cold-war tensions between communism and Western democracy, just as their predecessors did on depression-born frustrations and war fears during the 1930s.

Bigotry had its heyday in the late 30s. It went into eclipse in the brief era of peace, prosperity and goodwill following World War II. Some of its peddlers, on their uppers then, even had to hunt for jobs.

But now a revival is on. It's been coming up over the past year or two.

The House Un-American Activities Committee recently reported a "resurgence of neo-Fascist and hate activities."

The Post Office Department has noted an increase in complaints about hate literature, some of it resulting from the discovery by bigots that they could use the now-modified "junk mail" service.

A two-month study of current vitriol sheets and their sponsors by this reporter has produced these major conclusions:

- Hatemongering today is not as obvious a menace as it was in the late 30s, when it fed on deep economic unrest and was supported by Nazi and Fascist funds. There are perhaps 100 groups active in the country today, compared to 400 to 500 then. None has an organized membership such as those of the defunct Christian Front or German-American Bund.
- But today's bigots are growing bolder and are reaching an ever-expanding audience. Unless checked by exposure and education they again may grow strong enough to subject the nation to a bath of hate.
- New leaders, armed with new techniques and gimmicks to trap the unwary, have emerged from the underground era.
- Copying the fifth-column tactics of the Communists, hate specialists have had some success in in-filtrating legitimate right-wing and anti-Communist groups.

The resurgence of venom-spreading is largely an unwelcome dividend of the nation's awakening to the greater menace of the Communist conspiracy.

Many of its current hucksters use anti-communism as the cloak for their bigotry. They have learned that anti-communism is an effective sugar-coating to make the bitter pill of hate palatable to some Americans.

Anti-Red Cloak.

Thus Conde McGinley's semi-monthly Common Sense—denounced by the Un-American Activities Committee as a "hate factory"—masquerades under the title of "the Nation's Anti-Communist Newspaper."

It was in warning against such covers for bigotry that the committee said last year in its annual report: "It is not sufficient to be simply anti-Communist if one is anti-American at the same time."

Haters also use anti-communism to screen themselves from attacks. Anyone who turns the spotlight on their practices can expect to be branded by them as a Red.

Hate sheets from coast to coast let loose furious tirades at the Un-American Activities Committee after its brief report on hate groups was issued in December.

A California zealot wrote that the committee had been infiltrated by Communists and become a tool of subvesion.

A Vermont hate sheet called "The Green Mountain Rifleman" had this headline: "Velde Plays Swan Song on a Jew's Harp." Rep. Harold Velde (R., Ill.) was committee chairman when the report was issued.

Elizabeth Dilling of Chicago, called the report a plot to "silence all honest Christian patriots."

Many Targets.

Today's hate brochures have many targets, chiefly Negroes, Catholics, Jews and members of other minority groups.

Some of their most vicious barbs are aimed at President Eisenhower, to whom the more blatant sometimes refer as "Iky" or "Ike the Kike."

The ever-recurring theme in these attacks is that the President is a front for Bernard Baruch and that his administration is the "captive" of a Jewish "invisible government."

Incredible as such attacks seem to most Americans, some hate "crusades" are even more ludicrous.

Some recently have "exposed" fluoridation of drinking water—to retard tooth decay—as a Red-inspired plot to poison all true patriots. And others see equally sinister motives in the labeling of kosher foods as such.

The United Nations is depicted as the instrument of a "Jew-Communist" plot to rule the world. The Supreme Court is called subversive because of its anti-segregation decision.

Most fanatic groups hitched free rides last year on Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy's bandwagon, all without any apparent encouragement—or discouragement—from him.

New Tactics.

But some embraced McCarthyism warily. They could not reconcile his Catholicism and his use of Jewish investigator Roy Cohn with their own bigotry.

Rabble-rousers have adopted some new tactics since the late '30s.

Then they blared out their admiration of Hitler and their hatred of minorities on street corners and in hired halls.

Then synthetic storm troopers patrolled Bund meetings and native bigots tried to organize semimilitary forces such as the Silver Shirt Legion and the Knights of the White Camelia.

Today few of them try to stage public rallies in competition with TV. Vanished, too, are "elite guard" forces copied after those of Hitler and Mussolini.

Largely ignored by the press and radio, many have turned to pamphleteering, copying the style of slick magazines and advertising brochures.

Some use "news letters" and "intelligence services" to give their bigotry an air of authenticity.

Angel Backing.

These haters have discovered the value of direct mailing lists to get their literature into the hands of people who would never subscribe to or pay for it. Funds are solicited from wealthy angels to pay for the mailings.

It is impossible to tell how much money some hatemongers are now raking in or how many people they reach with their messages of discord.

Gerald L. K. Smith is one of the few who makes a public financial report. Since his Christian Nationalist Crusade operates as a political party, he has to report to Congress on its finances.

His reported receipts for the last three years averaged over $185,000 a year. This compares with the $113,000 he reported in 1950.

Common Sense claims to have distributed nearly 500,000 copies of "The Coming Red Dictatorship," an anti-Semitic broadside.

A West Coast purveyor claims to have put out more than 2,000,000 pieces of his "literature."

Fight Among Selves.

Despite all this fanaticism, there are some hopeful signs:

1. The hatemongers — unlike the Communists—lack central direction and organization. They copy each other's ideas, plug and sell each other's publications and sometimes even trade mailing lists. But whenever they try to get together they end up fighting like alley cats.

2. Outside of the deep South, hate appears to be waning as a political force. Elsewhere, no politician dares openly to embrace bigotry today. And most recent excursions into politics by hatemongers themselves have been flops.

3. Some disavow their bigotry. They issue vigorous denials of anti-Semitism, for instance, even though their publications openly attack Jews. Others resort to euphemisms (like Zionist for Jew) in hope of escaping the stigma most Americans place upon prejudice peddlers.

4. Some have even gone far afield for interest-catchers to help sell their hate sheets. Their gimmicks include spiritualism, quack cures and recently even flying saucers.

Tomorrow: The Old Pros of Bigotry.

Bigots Still Sow Poison

By JACK STEELE,
Scripps-Howard Staff Writer.

WASHINGTON, May 3.—Early in World War II the federal government indicted 29 assorted bigots and Bundists for conspiracy to commit sedition.

Their mass trial in Washington was an eight-month farce. The defendants used disruptive tactics which were copied by the Communists a decade later in the first Smith Act trial before Judge Harold Medina.

In the sedition case, the presiding judge died, a mistrial was declared and the indictments eventually were dismissed.

The trial demonstrated the difficulty of prosecuting hatemongers.

But it did turn the spotlight on the prewar hate ring. It hampered—temporarily—the operations of its leaders, including some who were not named in the indictments.

Today a surprising number—older, some seedier but unreformed—are back spreading hate. Others have faded into oblivion.

Here is what has happened to some of the old-timers who were not indicted in the sedition mistrial.

GERALD L. K. SMITH.

He's the No. 1 old pro of the haters. He has poked a finger into many efforts to stir up prejudice and disunity in the past 20 years. Some of his onetime lieutenants run little hate shops of their own. He taught them not only how to hate, but how to make hate pay.

Although he was not indicted in the sedition case, Smith rushed to Washington to raise a "million-dollar defense fund" for the trial.

He started out as a preacher. William Dudley

Pelley claims to have initiated him into the bigotry business. A hot-shot rabble rouser, Smith's raucous voice graced many prewar rallies.

He helped push Huey Long's share-the-wealth plan. After Long's assassination, he preached the funeral oration. Later he moved to Detroit, where Father Charles E. Coughlin's social justice program was in full swing.

In 1947 Smith shifted again to St. Louis, where he founded the Christian Nationalist Crusade as a vehicle for his own political ambitions. That, too, failed to catch on.

Now he operates from Los Angeles. He recently reported that 45 of 104 contributions of over $100 he received came from California.

Smith currently confines most of his rabble-rousing to the West Coast. But he also roams the country as the self-anointed go-between of the hate fraternity—living in the best hotels and sometimes traveling "incognito."

Here are a few of his recent ventures:

He helped engineer the abortive plot to block confirmation of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg as assistant defense secretary in 1950.

He led the hate attack on President Eisenhower in 1952 and, at the GOP convention, tried to stage a stampede for Gen. Douglas MacArthur. He ran Gen. MacArthur as the Christian Nationalist candidate for President—without the general's permission—but got only about 15,000 votes for him.

In 1953 he organized a new San Francisco conference "to abolish the United Nations." Last year he tried to muscle in on the McCarthy movement.

Smith tries to make his monthly magazine, the Cross and the Flag, a sort of bible of bigotry, doling out praise and criticism of his colleagues. But some refuse to accept him as the arbiter of the hate brigade.

THE REV. CHARLES E. COUGHLIN.

The so-called radio priest was not a defendant in the sedition trial. He was silenced on political issues by the Catholic Church in 1939.

Since then, Father Coughlin has stuck to running the spiritual affairs of the Shrine of the Little Flower near Detroit. His magazine, Social Justice, is defunct. The Christian Front, which he inspired, is inactive.

He emerged briefly two years ago to make a public speech indorsing the guaranteed annual wage.

GEORGE VAN HORN MOSELEY.

Gen. Moseley, onetime Army deputy chief of staff, likewise was not indicted in the sedition case, but he was a hero to many of the defendants.

Now living in semi-retirement in Atlanta, Gen. Moseley was until recently chief adviser to Judge George W. Armstrong, oil millionaire of Fort Worth and Natchez, Miss., who devoted his wealth and declining years to fomenting anti-Semitism and "white supremacy."

Armstrong, in 1950, offered oil lands worth $50,000,000 to Jefferson Military College if it would teach white, Aryan supremacy. The little Mississippi college turned down the offer.

Armstrong died last fall, but willed the bulk of his estate to two "fronts" for his bigotry. They may continue to put out his scurrilous pamphlets, including one devoted to the Korean War entitled "The Third Zionist War."

LYEL VAN HYNING.

Unlike her frequent collaborator, Elizabeth Dilling, Mrs. Van Hyning was not indicted in the sedition case. But these Chicago sirens of hate are equally strident.

Mrs. Van Hyning founded We, the Mothers, Mobilize for America and still issues her hate sheet, Women's Voice.

A recent issue carried an article headlined "Impeach Eisenhower." It attacked the President as the tool of Communists and Jews.

In a signed editorial in response to the Un-American Activities Committee's report on hate groups, she wrote: "I welcome any investigation which will expose the real enemies of my country, the Jews."

GEORGE SYLVESTER VIERECK.

Viereck was a prewar paid propagandist for Germany. Although not a sedition trial defendant, he served a jail term for violating the foreign agents' registration act.

He is now living quietly in a New York hotel and claims to have gone back to his first love —writing poetry.

Among his friends, however, are some of the ringleaders in the National Renaissance party, branded as neo-Fascist by the Un-American Activities Committee.

Viereck celebrated his 70th birthday recently at a cocktail party arranged by H. Keith Thompson, a former registered agent for the neo-Nazi Socialist Reich party. He was given a bound volume of tributes from such persons as Hjalmar Schacht, Franz von Papen and the Rev. Gerald B. Winrod.

Here is what has happened to some of the sedition mistrial defendants.

WILLIAM DUDLEY PELLEY.

Pelley has managed to blend hate and mysticism. An aristocratic mien and trim goatee have been his trademarks. In the 20s he promoted California real estate and a book purporting to describe his voyage to heaven. It was a round trip.

An early admirer of Hitler, he organized the Silver Shirt Legion the day after the Fuehrer came to power. For years he flooded the mails with such anti-Jewish, anti-Negro hate-sheets as Roll Call, Liberation and The Galilean.

Pelley drew a 15-year jail sentence after a separate trial for sedition in 1942. He was paroled in 1950, but the Supreme Court recently refused to restore his civil rights.

Now he lives in California, but issues a curious publication called Valor from his old headquarters at Noblesville, Ind. It is described in subtitles as "The Golden Times Weekly" and "A Journal of Applied Spirituality."

His big pitches are spiritualism and flying saucers. He has fathered a cult he calls "Soulcraft"—a name worthy of the advertising agencies where he might have flourished but for his obsession with bigotry.

Pelley has another new gimmick. Hour-long recordings of his mystical preachings and fund appeals are played at meetings of his followers.

GEORGE DEATHERAGE

Another dean of the venom dispensers, Deatherage is remembered for his Knights of the White Camelia. The Un-American Activities Committee accused him in a 1940 report of trying to create a "united Fascist movement" with his American Nationalist Confederation. Its emblem was a swastika.

After the sedition mistrial, Deatherage ran a contracting business in Baltimore. Last year he turned up in Florida as a "research specialist" for Upton Close and Don Bell, two former radio commentators who now put out nationalist "newsletters."

ELIZABETH DILLING

She plunged into bigotry in the 30s with a book entitled, "The Red Network" and an organization she called the Patriotic Research Bureau. She was one of the noisiest of the sedition trial defendants.

Hysterically anti-Semitic, Mrs. Dilling still puts out irregular "bulletins" and writes for Common Sense and other tip sheets of prejudice. She recently sent a diatribe to the Un-American Activities Committee demanding that she be heard or indicted.

EDWARD JAMES SMYTHE.

His chief claim to fame was an abortive attempt to unite the Ku Klux Klan and the German-American Bund. He also organized dozens of "Protestant" front groups as fund-raising ventures.

Smythe still sends out hate literature from Washington under the imprint of his latest front—the Protestant Press Assn. He recently moved out of an office here and claims he was "dispossessed by Jews."

He pleaded no defense to a mail fraud indictment in Newark, N. J., in 1950 and was given a three-year suspended sentence.

Smythe has been anti-Catholic and anti-Semitic. He wrote several years ago that, if forced to choose between Catholicism and communism, "we would gladly accept communism as the lesser of two evils." He recently told this reporter: "We're not Fascists or Nazis, but we are anti-Jewish."

JOE McWILLIAMS.

In the late 30s he incited street-corner crowds in New York's Yorkville section with pro-Hitler, anti-Semitic tirades. After the sedition mistrial, he moved to Chicago and then to the Northwest. He has not been heard from for several years.

LAWRENCE DENNIS.

Once called "the brains of American fascism," Dennis now puts out a newsletter entitled Appeal to Reason from Becket, Mass. A recent issue referred to World War II as "the war against anti-Semitism."

OTHERS.

Another aging sedition case defendant, Col. Eugene N. Sanctuary, still finds an outlet for his hate in the pages of Common Sense.

Robert E. Edmondson, in 1953, published a book, "I Testify," which was advertised as "American Invisible Government Unmasked."

James B. True, who once patented a club he called a "Kike Killer," died soon after the mistrial.

Bigotry Draws New Blood To Carry Same Old Poison

By JACK STEELE,
Scripps-Howard Staff Writer.

WASHINGTON, May 4.—Some of the hatemongers who flourished in the 1930s have retired or gone to seed, but new ones have grabbed up their besmirched banners.

Of these newcomers some were lieutenants or disciples of pre-World War II bigots. Others, with curious ease, drifted into the hate business from military service—sometimes after a taste of wartime intelligence work.

Still others turned aside from respected careers as their prejudices suddenly erupted from long-hidden wellsprings.

Here are some of the postwar neophytes in the hate cabal:

CONDE McGINLEY.

An old-time admirer of Father Charles E. Coughlin, McGinley began his activities in 1946 with a little paper called Think. He soon changed its name to the equally inappropriate Common Sense.

McGinley and Common Sense—which now boasts it is "the most widely circulated paper of its kind in the world"—were prime targets of the House Un-American Activities Committee's staff report on "Neo-Fascist and Hate Groups" issued last December.

The report said of Common Sense: "The most vitriolic hate propaganda ever to come to the attention of the committee."

It described McGinley as "a modern example of the racketeers who made a business out of un-American hate propaganda during the 1930s."

Common Sense is a fountainhead for anti-Semitic and anti-Negro propaganda. Its abusive articles are quoted widely and reprinted by other hate-sheets. Other rabble-rousers, old and new, find it a ready market for their diatribes.

McGinley last year spread his hate into politics and public affairs.

Issues of Common Sense were trucked into Maine in a futile effort to defeat Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R.).

Material put out by McGinley's Christian Education Assn. was used against Sen. Clifford P. Case (R.) in the New Jersey campaign.

Special anti-Negro issues of Common Sense were circulated in areas where school strikes were staged against the Supreme Court's antisegregation decision.

McGinley pulled out all stops with a newspaper-size broadside entitled "The Coming Red Dictatorship." It featured pictures of 36 prominent Jews, many of them officials of the Eisenhower administration.

Its headlines screamed: "Asiatic Marxist Jews control entire world as last world war commences—thousands of plotters placed in key positions by invisible government."

An all-Christian jury in Newark, N. J., last month awarded Rabbi Joachim Prinz a $30,000 verdict in a libel suit against McGinley. The award included $25,000 punitive damages. The jury held that Dr. Prinz had been labeled falsely as a "Red" in Common Sense. He headed the Jewish community in Berlin before being driven out by the Nazis.

ROBERT H. WILLIAMS.

This California pamphleteer and hate-sheet editor parades his bigotry under the guise of "intelligence." He advertises that his former service as an Air Force counterintelligence officer makes his publication vital for governors, mayors, police and "citizens interested in preventing sabotage and revolution."

But the Un-American Activities Committee reported that his intelligence duty consisted of less than a year as administrative officer for a bomber wing—a post where it said he could have received no information about "the Communist conspiracy."

The Air Force canceled his reserve commission in 1950 for the "best interest of the service."

Robert H. Williams, former Air Force major, who now runs a hate-spreading "intelligence" service.

His Williams Intelligence Summary is openly anti-Semitic. It is billed as "a monthly report on political and military developments, especially revealing the Jewish influence in these developments."

His pamphlet "Know Your Enemy" opens with the declaration: "This publication attacks no man because of his race, but it spares no subverter because of his race."

In it Williams suggests that all Jews should be interned in New York and strategic areas. Then, he argues, these areas would not be bombed by the Soviet.

Some of his fantasies are even more outrageous. He has charged that "Jewish General" Curtis LeMay arranged to drop the first two atomic bombs on the "only two sizable Christian centers in Japan."

FRANK L. BRITTON.

Also a Californian, Britton is one of the smoothest of the new hate peddlers.

His sheet, The American Nationalist, is a tabloid, printed on slick paper and splashed with color. Its format easily might be mistaken for the two most widely read publications in the Los Angeles area where he operates—Variety and The Hollywood Reporter.

Britton also runs a boycott campaign against Jews through a front group called the New Confederates. His color comic strips feature Uncle Sam in a pose copied from familiar "I Want You" recruiting posters. In Britton's comics, Uncle Sam offers advice like "Buy Gentile" and "Boycott Jew Stores."

JOHN O. BEATY.

Beaty is professor of English at Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Tex. As a wartime colonel in Army intelligence, he helped prepare daily G-2 reports for the White House.

But his book, "The Iron Curtain Over America," has been described by a Methodist minister, the Rev. Ralph L. Roy, as "the most extensive piece of anti-Semitic literature in the history of America's racist movement." Issued in 1951, it has gone through 15 printings and sold more than 50,000 copies. Most newspapers failed to review it and bookstores seldom display it, but it is constantly plugged by hate-sheets.

Beaty denies that he is anti-Semitic. In "Iron Curtain" he explains why. Its theme is that most European and American Jews are not Jews but "Khazars."

His theory—indorsed by some other haters — is that these Jews are descended from a Mongol tribe known as Khazars who adopted Judaism.

(Reputable historians say this is bunk. They agree that the Khazar tribe was scattered or destroyed centuries ago.)

But Beaty soberly parades the Khazar thesis. After an opening chapter glorifying Prussian militarism, he blames the Khazars for the New Deal, World War II. Communist subversion and what not. And in footnotes he quotes such authorities as McGinley's Common Sense.

Charges that he is anti-Semitic are "absurd," he maintains, since "the Khazar Jew is himself not a Semite."

JACK B. TENNEY.

Former chairman of the California Committee on Un-American Activities, Tenney is a recent convert to the hate brigade. He lost his seat in the State Senate last year after a campaign in which he attacked Jews.

He once called Gerald L. K. Smith a "racial agitator," but in 1952 was the Vice Presidential nominee of Smith's Christian Nationalist party. Smith contributed to his campaign and Tenney now writes for Smith's The Cross and the Flag.

Tenney also denies that he is anti-Semitic. But he has written three pamphlets attacking Jews: "Zion's Fifth Column," "Zionist Network" and "Zion's Trojan Horse."

EUSTACE MULLINS.

Mullins is a free-lancer of hate. A Virginian in his early 30s his bigoted articles have appeared since 1951 in Common Sense and other hate-sheets.

In 1952 an article entitled "Adolf Hitler: an Appreciation" appeared under his by-line in the Bulletin of the National Renaissance party, since branded by the Un-American Activities Committee as neo-Fascist.

He was active in the Aryan League of America and is credited with the authorship of the "Rabbi Rabinovich" canard—a modern version of the forged anti-semitic "Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion."

Bigot Business Hits All Faiths

By JACK STEELE,
Scripps-Howard Staff Writer.

WASHINGTON, May 5.—Prejudice is a disease that infects people of every religion, creed and race.

There is no common denominator to help classify the sources—any more than the targets—of the voices of bigotry now being raised in the United States.

Individual Catholics, Protestants and Jews are among those who cook up hate and abuse, just as these groups are among its victims.

A Protestant bigot, Edward James Smythe, is credited with this bit of doggerel which illustrates how the freebooters of scurrility attack every other group and then cloak their hate with some real or imagined menace:

God bless America.
The Jews own it.
The Catholics run it.
The Negroes enjoy it.
The Protestants founded it.
But the Communists will destroy it.

The hate fanatics use religion as others do patriotism and anti-communism as a cover for their bigotry. One hater, Elizabeth Dilling, even invented the alias of the Rev. Frank Woodruff Johnson as a byline for some of her writing.

Here are several of the fanatics who are spreading suspicion and loathing today.

THE REV. LEONARD A. FEENEY.

An excommunicated Catholic priest, Father Feeney for several years has run noisy hate rallies on the Boston Common with a little band of disciples he calls "Slaves of the Immaculate Heart of Mary."

He might be written off as a minor local nuisance except that:

- He puts out a vitriolic little sheet, The Point, which he mails—with or without request—to a growing list of Catholics.

● Groups of his followers have sprung up, and have had brushes with the law, in several Eastern cities.

Father Feeney aims his hate at Protestants and the Catholic hierarchy, but mostly at Jews.

A recent issue of The Point denounced the Catholic Church for deserting the "ancient dogma" that all

The Rev. Gerald B. Winrod campaigning for the GOP nomination for the U.S. Senate in Kansas in 1938.

Jews are eternally "cursed" and criticized leading Catholics by name for associating with Jews.

It hailed the Spanish Inquisition as a "glorious institution."

Father Feeney was a gifted author. Once literary editor of the Catholic monthly America, he has written pleasant poetry and a widely read little book titled "Fish on Friday."

The Catholic Church nas done all in its power to discipline him since he shifted to bigotry.

Archbishop Cushing unfrocked him for preaching the doctrine that there is no salvation for non-Catholics. The Jesuit Order expelled him. The Pope finally excommunicated him.

His headquarters, St. Benedict's Center, once was a study house for Catholic students at Harvard. Now Catholics are forbidden to enter it.

The Rev. Gerald B. Winrod.

This man ranks close to Gerald L. K. Smith as an old pro. For more than 20 years Winrod has blended bigotry with Protestant evangelism and made it pay handsomely.

He started out attacking Catholics. After a visit to Hitler's Germany in 1935, he took up anti-Semitism. He was linked with most of the prewar hatemongers and was a defendant with them in the sedition mistrial.

In 1940 Winrod was accused by the House Un-American Activities Committee of joining forces with George Deatherage and others to form a "United Fascist movement."

He still operates, from Wichita, Kans., an organization he calls "The Defenders of the Christian Faith."

Winrod returned to blatant bigotry in the 1952 campaign when he joined the hue and cry of the smearers of Gen. Eisenhower. He charged that Ike was the "choice" of the "international Jewish banking fraternity" for President.

Among his fund-raising gimmicks are "prayer-circle letters" mailed to his followers.

THE REV. HARVEY H. SPRINGER.

"Cowboy" Springer is another of the flock of Protestant fundamentalists who also preach hate. Since 1935 he has spread evangelism and bigotry from his headquarters, the Baptist Tabernacle at Englewood, Colo., a Denver suburb.

He is a hellfire-and-brimstone preacher who often makes evangelical tours of the South. He also is a shrewd businessman who has formed many organizations to foster his activities. They include the Rocky Mountain Evangelistic Assn., the Soul-Winning Bible Institute, the Protestant Information Bureau and the American Protestant League.

He operates a 160-acre Christian Youth Roundup Ranch near Denver and has incorporated a $250,000 stock-selling venture for a home for the aged.

Springer constantly has attacked Catholics. For a while he abandoned anti-Semitism, but recently has been assailing Jews again.

BENJAMIN H. FREEDMAN.

Freedman is a wealthy retired cosmetics manufacturer.

His association with hate publicists has been inexplicable and controversial.

He sided with the Arabs in the feud over creation of the State of Israel.

He has insisted that he is not anti-Semitic but only anti-Zionist, meaning anti-Israel.

He has contributed money and articles to the stridently anti-Semitic hate-sheet Common Sense. And he is widely quoted and praised by some racists—often in an effort to prove they are not anti-Semitic.

Freedman was the prime-mover in the abortive attempt to block confirmation of Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg as assistant defense secretary. Active in the same cause were Gerald Smith and Smith's "legislative representative"—Wesley Swift.

Freedman witnessed the statements, alleging that Mrs. Rosenberg once had been a member of a Communist front group, which induced the Senate Armed Services Committee to reopen hearings on her confirmation. It all turned out to be a flimsy case of mistaken identity.

Under questioning by the committee, Freedman admitted he had given more than $15,000 to Conde McGinley to finance Common Sense.

Segregation Ruling Roused Bigots

WASHINGTON, May 6.—The ink was hardly dry on the Supreme Court decision last year outlawing school segregation before the bigots and racists got busy.

Hatemongers seized upon the decision—a milestone in the evolution of civil rights—as potentially the most explosive and exploitable issue that had come their way since they became aware of the Communist menace.

Typically, they "exposed" the Supreme Court decision as being Communist-inspired, ignoring the fact that attacks on segregation in the United States long have been a favorite weapon in Moscow's propaganda arsenal.

Hate sheets from coast to coast flamed with vicious attacks on the Supreme Court and what they called its "mongrelization" policy. Some are still at it.

Old Ku Klux Klan elements hastily tried to regroup in the South, and new little racist groups sprang up here and there to fan prejudices.

Haters first moved to stir up trouble in Washington and states nearby, where integration was put into effect in some schools last fall without waiting for the Supreme Court's follow-up order.

Anti-Negro groups encouraged "strikes" of parents and pupils in Washington, Baltimore and small towns in West Virginia and Delaware. But firmhanded city and school officials—backed by responsible community groups and public opinion—soon quelled most of these demonstrations.

For the hatemongers this was only a trial run.

Some hope to start far more serious troubles when the Supreme Court lays down its plan for enforcing public school integration in the South, possibly starting next fall.

These are some of the individuals and groups engaged in fomenting disorder.

THE NAAWP.

The first hate group to cash in on school disruption was the National Assn. for the Advancement of White People. It's not-very-clever play on the name of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) apparently had an appeal to prejudice.

Its leader, Bryant Bowles, a 34-year-old ex-marine and Florida "cracker," had a record of arrests for passing worthless checks.

Bowles first formed the NAAWP in Washington late in 1953 in response to the Supreme Court decision outlawing racial covenants on real estate. He quickly reactivated it last year and in a few weeks claimed to have enrolled 50,000 members

The law moved in fast on Bowles. He vacated his Washington offices after a fracas with a Negro mailman and, last December, moved to Milford, Del., the scene of his only minor success. He now lives on the outskirts of Milford and is trying to organize a battle with its school board. A few days ago he was fined $600 for helping stir up the Milford school strike.

Conde McGinley threw the support of his anti-Semitic paper Common Sense behind Bowles. He put out a special issue in July which carried the headings: "Communism Hits South With Non-Segregation" and "Jewish Marxists Threaten Negro Revolt in America." A lead article by Eustace Mullins "traced" the Supreme Court's decision to a 1921 resolution by the Communist International.

Gerald L. K. Smith devoted a section of the January issue of The Cross and the Flag to the desegregation decision. Included were a picture of Bowles and a highly laudatory article. Smith also reported a $50 contribution to Bowles.

THE WHITE BROTHERHOOD.

Several new organizations are trying to rally old Klan elements in the South. One being watched closely is the so-called White Brotherhood, formed last fall in Tallahassee, Fla.

Its big wheel is Bill Hendrix, one-time adjutant of the Southern Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. He was convicted in 1952 of sending defamatory postcards through the mail and given a three-year suspended sentence.

CITIZENS' COUNCILS

The Citizens' Council move began in Mississippi and spread to Alabama and other states in the deep South. Its avowed aim was to bring economic pressure to bear on Negroes who insist on enforcement of the Supreme Court's anti-segregation decision.

Many Southern newspapers attacked this movement, one referring to it as a "refined descendant of the Ku Klux Klan."

However, Citizens' Councils have been set up in many deep Southern communities. They haven't done much yet, but they are ready to go into action when the first efforts are made to enforce school integration.

OTHER GROUPS.

The National Citizens Protective Assn., which started out to stir up racial troubles in St. Louis, is trying to expand into a nationwide group. The power behind it is John W. Hamilton, a one-time aid of Gerald Smith He turned to anti-Negro activ ities when, he said, he got tired of Smith's "Jew, Jew, Jew stuff." Hendrix is one of the group's directors.

Other anti-Negro groups which have sprung up or gained a new lease on life in the South include:

The National Assn. for the Preservation of the White Race.

The National Assn. for the Advancement and Protection of a Majority of the White Race.

The National Patrick Henry Organization.

The Southerners.

The Pro-Southerners.

The Moonlighters.

The Grass Roots League.

The American States Rights Assn.

THE ISLAM CULT.

Negro organizations like the NAACP have fought bigotry in all its forms. But a few Negroes have formed little hate groups of their own. One is known variously as the Nation of Islam, the Allah Temple of Islam and the Muslim Cult of Islam.

Some members of this secret all-Negro cult preach militant hate of white. The cult has a military arm known as the FOI. Some authorities say this stands for "Fruit of Islam."

Peddlers of Hate

Bigotry Moving In On Right-Wing Units

Haters Employ Old Red Tactics

By JACK STEELE,
Scripps-Howard Staff Writer.

WASHINGTON, May 7.—New right-wing and isolationist groups now springing to life are providing a happy hunting ground for peddlers of prejudice.

Bigots of varying kind and degree are trying to infiltrate and take over these organizations set up to give voice to ultra-conservative or neo-nationalist sentiments.

Such groups are legitimate enough and have an unchallengeable role to play in the formation of American public opinion, just as do those of the non-Communist left.

But haters hope to use these groups for their own ends—either as covers for trouble-making or as paths to the pocketbooks of wealthy and unsuspecting angels.

In efforts to infiltrate right-wing groups, the forces of bigotry have adopted the fifth-column tactics of the Communists.

They readily take over and preach the doctrines of the particular group they want to penetrate. Often they cover their operations with an aura of intrigue and conspiracy.

Some operators try to conceal or explain away their own unsavory pasts. Others hide their prejudices behind euphemisms designed to fool the unwary and confuse their critics.

Pamphleteer Joseph P. Kamp as he testified before a House committee investigating lobbying in 1950.

These tactics make such infiltration hard to tag, as these recent case histories will indicate.

JOSEPH P. KAMP.

Kamp has been one of the nation's most prolific pamphleteers. He turns out brochures loaded with distortions and with appeals to fear and prejudice. Then he sells batches of them to businessmen and others to distribute "where they will do the most good."

Who supplies the money to keep Joe Kamp going? He won't say.

He went to jail for four months for contempt rather than disclose the sources of his revenue to a House Campaign

Expenditures Committee in 1944. He was convicted on similar charges in 1950, but won a retrial and acquittal.

Kamp, who refers to anti-Semitism as a "dirty little Communist swear word," vehemently denies that he is anti-Semitic.

But dislike of Jews creeps into much of his literature. That was the case with anti-Eisenhower propaganda he turned out before the 1952 convention.

He devoted two 16-page issues of his publication, Headlines, to candidate Eisenhower. The first was headed "Who's Promoting and What's Behind 'We Want Ike'?" and the second "More About What's Behind Ike."

Kamp's answer was obvious —Communists and Jews.

More recently Kamp has cashed in on Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy's fame. He formed a front called the Committee FOR McCarthyism and put out a "miniature library" of pamphlets on McCarthy.

He also took it upon himself last year to answer the "McCarthy Balance Sheet" — a series of articles by World-Telegram reporter Frederick Woltman, who won a Pulitzer Prize for exposing Communists. Kamp's pamphlet was titled: "The Red-Addled Brain Behind the Scripps-Howard Smear of Sen. McCarthy."

ALLAN A. ZOLL.

Zoll is another pamphleteer and promoter whose most successful venture was the National Council for American Education. This outfit, with a name easily confused with the respected American Council on Education, fomented a wave of troubles in the public schools Here's how it worked.

Zoll's Council put out pamphlets which served as blueprints for "exposing" school administrators, teachers and textbooks as being "Red-tinged" and for attacking so-called educational frills.

These were sold to taxpayer groups interested in cutting school costs and to patriotic groups aroused by Zoll's extravagant Red charges. Use of the pamphlets touched off a rash of battles in public school systems across the nation.

The New York World-Telegram and Sun first disclosed that Zoll was behind all this and told who he was.

Zoll in 1937 founded and became national commander of the American Patriots Inc. Attorney General Francis Biddle in 1940 listed it as "Fascist." Zoll called this a New Deal smear, but the now-defunct group is still carried on the Attorney General's list for the Eisenhower Administration's security program.

Zoll has been inactive since he married the elderly widow of an oil millionaire late in 1953. She sued for divorce last December. He is now back in his New York haunts—presumably ready for a new venture.

THE UNITED NATIONS

The U.N. is one of the major targets of blatant bigots. Gerald L. K. Smith and his fellow hatemongers rarely miss a chance to charge that the U.N. is part of a "Jewish-Communist" plot to destroy the sovereignty of the United States.

Neo-isolationists who are forming new groups patterned after the old America First Committee likewise center their attacks on the U.N.—without combining them with appeals to prejudice and bigotry.

These parallel attacks on the U.N. and one-worldism can and do create a good deal of confusion.

Take the case of W. Henry MacFarland Jr.

MacFarland now runs the American Flag Committee from his home in Philadelphia.

Attacks on the U.N. issued under this imprint have been widely circulated in the last few years—and widely reprinted by hate sheets.

But many people who have read and perhaps been influenced by the publications of the American Flag Committee know little about MacFarland's background.

A one-time admirer and supporter of Gerald Smith, MacFarland once ran from the same address in Philadelphia an outfit called the Nationalist Action League.

The attorney general cited the Nationalist Action League as Fascist on April 27, 1949, and its name still appears on the Justice Department's list.

A few weeks after it was so listed, MacFarland sought to unite the Nationalist Action League with a group of supporters of hatemonger Conde McGinley. For a short time, McGinley's Common Sense was the official organ of the league.

The House Un-American Activities Committee charged in its report last December on hate groups that MacFarland had also been active in the National Renaissance party, a group branded by the committee as "neo-Fascist."

MacFarland's union with McGinley did not last long. Soon after it broke up he formed the American Flag Committee as a vehicle for his attacks on the U.N.

Can Morality Be Legislated?

By JOHN P. ROCHE and MILTON M. GORDON

Yes, say these observers, as the Supreme Court's desegregation decrees are awaited. Under certain conditions, 'the majesty of the law not only enforces, but creates, morality.'

THE Supreme Court is pondering its decision on how and when to carry out its ruling of a year ago that public school segregation is unconstitutional. It is therefore timely to examine the relationship between law and mores, between the decrees of courts and Legislatures and the vast body of community beliefs which shape private action.

While it is not perhaps customary to think of the Supreme Court as a legislative body, the cold fact is that in the desegregation cases, the nine justices have undertaken to rewrite public policy in at least seventeen states and innumerable communities. Indeed, it would be difficult to find a recent Congressional enactment that equals in impact and scope this judicial holding. Whether one approves or disapproves of such judicial acts, it is clear that the court has undertaken a monumental project in the field of social engineering, and one obviously based on the assumption that morality can be legislated.

Opponents of the desegregation decision have, with the exception of a fringe of overt white supremacists, largely founded their dissent on the principle that law can not move faster than public opinion, that legal norms which do not reflect community sentiment are unenforceable. They cite the dismal failure of Prohibition as a case in point, urging that basic social change—however desirable—must come from the bottom, from a shift in "grass-roots" convictions.

On the other hand, the court's supporters maintain that virtually every statute and judicial decree is, to some extent, a regulation of morality. Indeed, they suggest, if the moral standards of individuals were not susceptible to state definition and regulation, we would never have emerged from primitive barbarism.

IN this article, we shall examine from the viewpoint of the social scientist the evidence on both sides of the question, and see if it is possible to extract any meaningful conclusions.

First of all, we must delve into the relationship that exists in a democratic society between law and community attitudes. While this is a treacherous area, full of pitfalls for the unwary generalizer, it seems clear that, as distinguished from a totalitarian society, law in a democracy is founded on consensus. That is to say that the basic sanctions are applied not by the police, but by the community. The jury system institutionalizes this responsibility in such cases as "mercy killings" or those involving "the unwritten law" by finding citizens who have unquestionably killed "not guilty."

Conversely, juries applying other sections of the criminal code—notably those penalizing subversion—will often bring in verdicts of "guilty" based not so much on technical guilt as upon the proposition that the defendant should be taken out of circulation. In another area of the law, insurance companies, faced with damage suits, have learned to shun juries like the plague. Indeed, they will frequently make unjustified out-of-court settlements in preference to facing a jury that begins its labors with the seeming assumption that no insurance company of any standing would miss $100,000.

FROM this it should be clear that in the United States law is a great deal more, and simultaneously a great deal less, than a command of the sovereign. Thus one can safely say that no piece of legislation, or judicial decision, which does not have its roots in community beliefs, has a chance of being effectively carried out.

To this extent, it is undeniable that morality cannot be legislated; it would be impossible, for example, to make canasta playing a capital offense in fact, even if the bridge-players' lobby were successful in getting such a law on the books. This is a fanciful example, but in our view the Volstead Act and the Eighteenth Amendment were no less unrealistic in objective: like H. L. Mencken's friend, Americans seem willing to vote for Prohibition as long as they can stagger to the polls.

Excluding these extreme efforts to legislate morality, which are obviously unsound, we now come to the heart of the problem: Under what circumstances will an individual accept distasteful regulation of his actions? To put it another way: What are the criteria which lead an individual to adjust his acts to the demands of the state?

SPECIFICALLY, why do people pay taxes when they disagree strongly with the uses to which the money will be put? A large-scale tax revolt, as the French have recently discovered, is almost impossible to check without recourse to martial law and police state methods, but the average taxpayer grouses and pays. While Americans are not, by and large, as law-abiding as their British cousins, it is probably fair to say that most of us obey most laws without even reflecting on their merits.

This problem of the basis of legal norms has proved a fascinating one to sociologists. In the past fifteen years some significant new thinking on the subject has grown out of empirical research, more incisive analysis, and general observation of large-scale experiences with legal desegregation in important areas of American life such as employment, public housing and the Armed Forces.

The older categorical view stated in classic fashion by the sociologist William Graham Sumner, was that law could never move ahead of the customs or mores of the people—that legislation which was not firmly rooted in popular folkways was doomed to failure. The implication was that social change must always be glacier-like in its movement and that mass change in attitudes must precede legislative action.

Supreme Court building, Washington—"In its desegregration decision, the Court has undertaken a monumental project in social engineering."

THE newer viewpoint is based on a more sophisticated and realistic analysis of social processes. In the first place, it questions the older way of stating the problem in terms of all or nothing. Any large, complex society, with its multiplicity of social backgrounds and individual experiences, contains varying mores and attitudes within itself. On any given piece of legislation there will not just be supporters and enemies; rather there will be many points of view, ranging from unconditional support, through indifference, to unmitigated opposition.

Thus, the degree of success that will attend such an enactment is the result of a highly complex series of interactions and adjustments among people with diverse attitudes toward the measure itself and toward the imposition of legal authority. Furthermore, it is predictable that a large segment of the population will be basically neutral, if not totally indifferent.

To put the matter in an even broader framework, the prediction of behavior must take into consideration not only the attitudes of the individual but also the total social situation in which his behavior is to be formulated and expressed. For instance, people with ethnic prejudice are likely to express themselves in a social clique where, say, anti-Semitic jokes are au fait, but will restrain themselves in a group where such remarks are greeted with hostility. Once the bigot realizes that he must pay a social price for his anti-Semitism, he is likely to think twice before exposing himself to the penalty.

IN this connection, Robert K. Merton, Columbia sociologist, has set up an incisive classification, suggesting that four major groups can be delineated:

(1) The all-weather liberal, who can be expected to oppose prejudice and race discrimination under any set of social conditions; (2) the fair-weather liberal, who is not himself prejudiced, but who will stand silent or passively support discrimination if it is easier and more profitable to do so; (3) the fair-weather illiberal, who has prejudices, but is not prepared to pay a significant price for expressing them in behavior, preferring rather to take the easier course of conformity; and (4) the all-weather illiberal, who is prepared to fight to the last ditch for his prejudices at whatever cost in social disapproval.

If we apply this classification to such a problem as desegregation, it immediately becomes apparent that the critical strata, so far as success or failure is concerned, are groups two and three. Group one will support the proposal with vigor and group four will oppose it bitterly, but groups two and three will carry the day.

But because groups two and three are not crusaders, are not strongly motivated, they are particularly susceptible to the symbolism of law. Thus the fact that fair employment practices have been incorporated into law, or that the Supreme Court has held school segregation unconstitutional, will itself tend to direct their thinking toward compliance.

THE symbols of state power are to the undedicated non-revolutionary mighty and awesome things, and he will think long and hard before he commits himself to subversive action. Consequently the law tends to become, in another of Merton's phrases, a "self-fulfilling prophecy"; that is, a statute tends to create a climate of opinion favorable to its own enforcement. As John Locke long ago pointed out, the great roadblock to revolution is not the police but the habits of obedience which lead the law-abiding majority to refrain from even legitimate and justified resistance.

American experience over the past decade and a half seems to confirm this hypothesis. By legislative action, executive order and judicial decision, the race prejudices of Americans have been denied public sanction. Fair employment practices commissions, of national scope during the war and subsequently operative in a number of states and municipalities, integration of the Armed Forces, integration of many segregated schools, elimination of "white primaries" and removal of racial restrictions in many professional associations—all these have provided a living laboratory for the study of the impact of law on the mores.

AT virtually every stage in the development, strong voices were raised to plead that morality could not be legislated, that an end to discrimination must await an unprejudiced public. Yet, the results indicate a high degree of compliance, some covert evasion, and only a few instances of violent resistance.

Moreover, it should be kept in mind that the success of desegregation laws or orders need not be measured against a hypothetical standard of 100 per cent but against the usual standards of law enforcement. Even laws against homicide and rape, which have overwhelming community support, are occasionally violated.

But, while laws may restrain behavior, is there any evidence to indicate that attitudes are affected? Here the evidence seems clear: the law itself plays an important part in the educational process. Again the key to analysis is the social situation.

Legislation and administrative orders which have prohibited discrimination in such areas as employment, the Armed Forces, public housing, and professional associations have brought people of various races together—often with initial reluctance—in normal day-to-day contact on an "equal-status" basis where the emphasis is on doing a job together. Contact of this kind gives people a chance to know one another as individual human beings with similar interests, problems and capabilities. In this type of interaction racial stereotypes are likely to be weakened and dispelled.

SUCH a favorable change of attitude as a result of personal contact has been reported in a number of studies. In one carefully designed research project, Morton Deutsch and Mary Evans Collins found that white housewives who had been assigned to public housing projects which were racially integrated tended to develop favorable attitudes toward Negroes, while the vast majority of those who occupied segregated housing tended to remain the same in their racial views. A study of integration in the Army reached a similar conclusion.

Findings such as these support a considerably broader and more complex conception of the relations between legal norms and human acts and attitudes than did the older, simpler Sumner thesis. In this more comprehensive analysis, law itself is seen as a force which, in its impact, does more than prohibit or compel specific behavior. Indeed, in its operation, law actually provides the setting for types of social relationships—relationships which may have a profound effect on the very attitudes which are necessary to adequate enforcement of the statute in question.

WE thus come down to the final and crucial problem. It is plain that under some circumstances morality can be legislated, while under other conditions, the laws prove impotent. But what are the specific factors which must be evaluated? What criteria can be offered as a guide to intelligent and effective action in these touchy areas of belief, superstition and vested prejudice? The following four considerations are suggested as a beginning:

First, the amount of opposition and its geographical spread. If a random of 15 per cent of the population, roughly gauged, oppose some regulation, there will probably be little difficulty in gaining public acceptance and enforcement. However, and this is particularly relevant to the desegregation problem, if the 15 per cent all live in one compact geographical area where they constitute a majority, control local government and supply juries, the magnitude of the problem is much greater.

Second, the intensity of opposition. This is a qualitative matter, for, to paraphrase George Orwell, while all Americans are created equal, some are more equal than others. A proposal which is militantly opposed by "opinion-formers" in the American community—for example, ministers, lawyers, newspaper editors—will have much harder sledding than a nose-count of the opponents would seem to justify, and, conversely, a measure which receives the support of this key group, or significant segments of it, can overcome a numerically large resistance.

MUCH of the success of the Negro in overcoming his legal, social and economic disabilities has been an outgrowth of the strong stand on his behalf taken by church leaders, journalists, trade unionists, business men and politicians who have created a climate of opinion favorable to Negro claims and who have based their assertions on the values which constitute the American Creed: Equality of treatment under law and human brotherhood under God. With this quality of support, much can be accomplished even against great numbers.

Third, the degree to which sanctions can be administered. Here we turn to the practical problems of enforcement, and it is at this point that Prohibition really should have run aground long before it was incorporated into public policy. Home manufacture of alcoholic beverages has, according to well informed sources, even survived in the Soviet Union, and if the M. V. D. is incapable of banning private brew, there is little reason to suspect that a democratic society could handle the job.

It can not be emphasized too often that general principles of morality are no stronger than the instruments by which they are implemented; it would thus be legislative folly to try to prohibit people from disliking Jews, Negroes, Catholics, or Protestants. However, making gin in the bathtub, or disliking minorities, is not action equivalent to segregating school children on the basis of their pigmentation.

BECAUSE it is nearly impossible to regulate what goes on in millions of private homes, it does not follow that enforcement of desegregation in public institutions will be equally difficult. In sum, false and misleading analogies must be avoided, and each proposal must be examined on its merits to determine whether or not it is enforceable.

Fourth, the diligence of enforcement. It is extremely important that enforceable regulations be diligently enforced. This is particularly true in the initial period when public attitudes (specifically, the attitudes of Merton's groups two and three) are in the process of formation. Flagrant refusal to obey usually is designed as a symbolic act to rally the undecided, and strong action at such a time will convince many wavering minds that the best course is compliance.

The Milford, Del., episode—where parents, stirred up by agitators, refused to send their children to a desegregated school—is a good case-study of what should not happen; there vigorous action by the state authorities, such as occurred under similar circumstances in Baltimore, would have dampened the ardor of the fanatics and decimated their fellow-travelers. The danger is that successful symbolic defiance plants the dragon seed and brings into the resistance movement those who would otherwise remain interested and sympathetic spectators—at a distance.

IN short, to ask, "Can morality be legislated?", is actually to pose the wrong question. What types of morality, under what conditions, and with what techniques for enforcement are qualitative considerations which fragment the question into more answerable units. Our analysis suggests that, although large-scale local considerations may call for special circumstances of implementation, the majesty of the law, when supported by the collective conscience of a people and the healing power of the social situation, in the long run will not only enforce morality but create it.

Note: This article was written prior to the Supreme Court decision of May 31, 1955, assigning to the lower courts the responsibility for seeing that its desegregation decision is carried out as promptly and completely as local conditions permit.

Let's Talk About Immigration

EDWARD CORSI

THE CRUCIAL ISSUE of immigration is an old one—about as old as our Republic. The Alien and Sedition Acts, the first manifestation of intolerance and discrimination against immigrants and prospective immigrants, were passed during the Administration of our second President, John Adams, and quickly repealed when Thomas Jefferson took office. What happened later on—the agitations against Irish and Germans, the systematic sowing of fears about "Popish idolatries" and "Jesuit intrigues" in the 1840's and 1850's, the formidable growth of the "Know-Nothing" party before the Civil War—all this is in elementary history textbooks. Unfortunately our present immigration laws serve to remind us that racial and religious bigotry are not just a matter of past history.

In more recent times the flaming crosses of the Ku Klux Klan, revived in 1915, could be considered nothing more than a colorful if brutal item of Americana.

Now we are living in a glass house. Our foreign policy does not express itself exclusively through the declarations of our diplomats and traveling statesmen abroad. Our immigration laws as administered by our consular officials are an essential part of our diplomacy; their impact is felt not just in chancelleries but by the harassed, fearful people whom I saw during my many trips patiently standing in long lines at the doors of American consulates.

It is important to realize, I believe, that whatever our immigration laws may be, good or bad, they are worked out abroad not at the ambassadorial but at the consular level. What the godlike powers of an American consul, whose decisions are beyond appeal, have become these days, I feel incapable of describing. The many-sided artistry of Gian Carlo Menotti has done the job. Some of Menotti's doleful tunes were haunting me while I was visiting American consular establishments. It struck me, however, that there is something new since Menotti composed The Consul: The American consul today is a frightened little god who exhausts his energies scrutinizing other people with the same distrustful uneasiness with which he himself is scrutinized by his superior officers back home.

Help Wanted

The laws the harassed American consul has to apply to the men, women, and children who crowd his office seem primarily designed to keep people away from our shores—whether they are prospective immigrants or merely people who only want visitors' visas. The laws are based on the assumption that some races are inferior to others and that irrespective of race there is evil in the intention and in the character of anyone who for any reason wants to come here. Incidentally, the American public does not know how frequently foreigners who have a good chance of being admitted say "Thank you, no," and walk out of the consulate rather than submit to the endless questioning, fingerprinting, and scrutiny of their pasts that they consider a revolting invasion of their privacy.

The harmful effects of the present immigration law, the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952, which was passed by Congress over President Truman's veto, appear at once when we look at it from the viewpoint of self-interest and see what this law has done to the economy of our country.

Ever since the 1920's our immigration laws have deprived us of the manpower and the skills that our expanding economy require by cutting off immigration from the very countries that can provide these skills. Except during brief periods of recession, our economy has always called for more manpower. This demand used to be met through natural population growth, internal migration of labor—and immigration.

This labor demand is now being met by draining manpower from the farms, by immigration from non-quota countries in the Western Hemisphere, and by importing temporary labor from neighboring lands, much of it smuggled in from Mexico. Like the demand for liquor during the prohibition years, the demand for labor has been satisfied by makeshift and frequently illegal means.

THERE IS at the present time a shortage of manpower in agriculture. Finding local labor to harvest the crops is becoming more and more difficult—sometimes so difficult that fields are left uncultivated.

It is true that as of last January we had 3,347,000 unemployed in the United States. In New York State alone there are now upwards of 266,000 people getting unemployment insurance from the state treasury. Even so, many thousands of extremely important jobs are going begging. Ours is a free society and we cannot force our unemployed to take jobs for which they have no training and no liking.

There are serious shortages of skilled tailors, dressmakers, mechanics, precision workers, watchmakers, cooks, bakers, farmers, domestics, and in other classifications in which many jobs have traditionally been filled by immigrants. David Dubinsky, the head of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and one of the most constructive labor leaders in America, told me recently that if the shortage of skilled workers in the garment industry continues, in ten years it will be hard to find tailors in the United States who can produce a custom-made or fit a ready-made suit. Clothing manufacturers in Rochester are not only having difficulty recruiting trained workers but cannot even find apprentices to train despite the industry's high wages and excellent working conditions.

Restaurants all over America cannot find competent cooks to keep pace with America's growing tendency to eat out rather than at home. The shortage is so acute that the average small restaurant is now relying not on experienced cooks but on ordinary kitchen help improvising at the stove.

These shortages lead to disproportionately high labor costs and to demands for high tariffs to protect goods that cannot be produced competitively here for lack of the necessary skilled labor.

While the McCarran-Walter Act extends preference to workers with high technical training, the numerical limitations of the quota system tend to defeat that purpose.

IN THIS connection, it is important to notice that the traditional antagonism to immigration by organized labor has substantially been abandoned. Needless to say, enlightened and responsible labor leaders like George Meany and Walter Reuther—like every person who has sensibly approached the problem of immigration in our day—are not in favor of a return to the uncontrolled immigration of the early 1900's. But they recognize that a greater flow of immigration – selective and controlled—is needed in order to meet the demands of our expanding economy. Many labor leaders feel that this economy of ours could profitably absorb a quarter of a million immigrants a year—approximately the same number that is proposed in the Lehman-Celler bill now before Congress.

No Scientists Need Apply

The present law—the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952—fixes a specific annual quota for each of eighty-five countries, the total being 154,657. Any nation's quota is equal to one-sixth of one per cent of the number of persons in our 1920 population who were of that origin. Minimum quotas of one hundred are given to a number of Asian countries that were previously excluded entirely. The quotas allotted each country within this total are neither interchangeable nor cumulative, which means that unless all quotas are filled each year—and this never happens—the unused allotments are forfeited. The United Kingdom, Eire, and Germany are given about 109,000 visas; the remaining 45,000 have to be divided among all the nations of the world. Overpopulated Italy has a quota of 5,645, while the United Kingdom, whose people can emigrate to places within the Commonwealth like Canada and Australia but who are under no great pressure to leave home anyway, has the largest of all quotas—65,361. It is never filled.

Because of the mortgaging of the Greek quota under the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, which allows countries to mortgage up to fifty per cent of their annual quota for an indefinite period, only 154 Greeks can come here each year until 2013. Latvia's quota of 235 is reduced by half for the next 320 years.

THE ACT provides for non-quota migration from independent countries in the Western Hemisphere. Also, spouses and unmarried children of U.S. citizens are admitted without restriction. And so are qualified ministers. But professors and scientists, who were admitted outside their countries' quotas under the old Act of 1924, can be admitted under the Act of 1952 only within them.

For example, if someone like the late Enrico Fermi, the refugee Italian scientist who played a major role in the development of the atomic bomb, or the Hungarian Leo Szilard wanted to come to this country for permanent residence today, he would have to do the following: Obtain a clearance from the United States Employment Service, get written statements from some labor organization, submit affidavits from persons having special knowledge of him, assemble clippings of American advertisements calling for the services he claims to be able to render, and produce certified copies of diplomas, school certificates, and similar documents. He would then be placed on a waiting list. Any scientist born in a country to which we have allotted the generous quota of one hundred would have practically no chance at all.

Do the supporters of the McCarran Act think that ours is the only country where refugee scientists and scholars can perform their tasks?

The Race Myth

The reasons for discrimination against certain nations and races and in favor of others were stated quite forcefully by the late Senator McCarran himself in the Senate debate on his immigration bill on May 16, 1952:

". . . the cold, hard truth is that in the United States today there are hard-core, indigestible blocs who have not become integrated into the American way of life, but who, on the contrary, are its deadly enemy." Senator McCarran did not specify from which foreign nations the "hard-core, indigestible blocs . . . deadly enemy" were coming, but by simply looking at the chart on page 24 we can guess which ones he had in mind.

Many other statements made by our elected representatives during the debate illustrate the climate of opinion which has produced our immigration laws since the early 1920's and still blocks all efforts to liberalize the immigration policy of the United States—an attitude of wholesale mistrust and fear of certain races.

Our lawmakers still lean heavily, whether they know it or not, on the pseudo-scientific theories and baseless fears that went into the writing of the restrictive Acts of 1921 and 1924. These theories first found their expression in the anthropological vagaries and racist myths of Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Madison Grant, Lothrop Stoddard, and other "scientists."

According to these writers, some races are hopelessly wayward; the superior races are the blond Nordics, mainly Anglo-Saxons and Teutons; eastern and southern Europeans, along with Asians, Africans, and the rest of the colored peoples, are to be ruled by their Nordic betters if they know what's good for them.

THESE now completely discredited theories are still codified in our immigration laws, which provide that preference be extended to the Germans, the English, and the Celts, whose culture is seen as identical with ours and who are therefore assimilable. The rest of humanity in the quota areas is kept out either by token quotas of one hundred a year—the McCarran-Walter allotment to China, India, the African countries, and other nonwhite areas—or by ridiculously low quotas, as in the case of the Italians, the Greeks, the Poles, and other Europeans.

It is interesting to look back on the writings of these American racists. In The Passing of the Great Race

(1916), the late Madison Grant of the American Museum of Natural History wrote: "These new immigrants were no longer exclusively members of the Nordic race as were the earlier ones . . . The new immigration . . . contained a large and increasing number of the weak, the broken, and the mentally crippled of all races drawn from the lowest stratum of the Mediterranean basin and the Balkans, together with hordes of the wretched, submerged populations of the Polish ghettos. . . . the whole tone of American life, social, moral, and political has been lowered and vulgarized by them."

He later wrote: "Much of the immigration during the last century has been identical with the old British stock in all respects. The English and the Scotch who have come over here, as well as the Scandinavians and most of the Germans, and perhaps some other elements, are to be regarded as reinforcements of the older stock."

In a spirit of lyric exaltation after the Act of 1924 became law, Lothrop Stoddard of Harvard in his book Re-Forging America (1927) wrote:

". . . not since the nation's youthful days before 1850 have America's prospects been so bright as they are right now. We have already seen that the Immigration Restriction Act of 1924 marks the second great turning-point in our national life."

After having quoted the pseudo-scientific rantings of a generation past, it is a relief to be able to report that among a group of internationally respected anthropologists who were consulted in the preparation of a UNESCO pamphlet in 1952, "There was no delay or hesitation or lack of unanimity in reaching the primary conclusion that there were no scientific grounds whatever for the racialist position regarding purity of race and the hierarchy of inferior and superior races to which this leads."

As to what goes into the racial composition of an American, Sinclair Lewis gave the classic definition in describing Martin Arrowsmith, the hero of one of his best novels:

"Martin was, like most inhabitants of Elk Mills before the Slavo-Italian immigration, a Typical Pure-bred Anglo-Saxon American, which means that he was a union of German, French, Scotch, Irish, perhaps a little Spanish, conceivably a little of the strains lumped together as 'Jewish,' and a great deal of English, which is itself a combination of Primitive Briton, Celt, Phoenician, Roman, German, Dane, and Swede."

Embarrassing Questions

Although neither reason nor science can furnish any support for the racialist, discriminatory laws of the 1920's, it is not hard to understand how at that particular time the nation turned toward a mythical past and away from Europe. In the revulsion that followed the First World War, any idea that our country had a responsibility of leadership was often rudely or cynically laughed off. What use was there, people asked, in getting further involved with an ungrateful, messy world? It was much better to keep our country isolated and isolationist. The best way to guarantee our freedom in a world tumbling into slavery and chaos was to exert a very strict control over the new blood and the old culture flowing in from Europe.

We cannot go back to that era of wonderful nonsense. Now we are the center of a broad alliance, and our national survival largely depends on the vigor of that alliance. We are frequently and deeply concerned, and rightly so, with elections in nations which our immigration laws still consider inferior and from which we admit only a trickle of immigrants.

When, in 1948, people of Italian descent in the United States embarked on the famous letters-to-Italy campaign urging the defeat of Communism in the Italian elections, the writers laid great stress on the blessings democracy had bestowed upon them in America. The Italian Communists then staged an effective counter campaign of letters to America: What about letting us, people of your own blood, share with you the abundance of American life? they asked. Will your government let us come?

During the hearings before the President's Commission on Immigration and Nationalization in 1952, an American business leader, soldier, and statesman, William H. Draper, summed up the principles that should have guided our lawmakers:

"What I am proposing concretely is that we take another close look at our immigration policy and adjust it to the conditions of the world of today and tomorrow and to our place and role in that world. This does not mean that we should remove all barriers and throw our gates open to all and sundry, without control and limits. But it does mean that our policy as expressed in legislation on the statute books should be responsive to our needs and capabilities. We are capable of admitting, absorbing, and assimilating more newcomers than is permitted under present legislation. We need not tie our hands to national-origin quotas based on legislation enacted over a quarter of a century ago in circumstances which no longer exist and which discriminates undeservedly against some of our own partners in NATO. In endeavoring to strengthen the economic and military defense of the free world, and particularly of the North Atlantic community, we should recognize immigration policy as one of the elements in achieving economic and political stability as well as social equilibrium."

Yet it was not the wisdom typified by General Draper's opinion that prevailed but that of a small, powerful group of politicians, committee chairmen, and "experts," people whose discredited theories are carbon copies of Grant and Stoddard. We find even so reasonable a man as Senator Walter F. George of Georgia, now chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, saying in May, 1952, on the floor of the Senate, that he had helped frame the 1924 immigration law and "I hope the time has not come when one must apologize for being a hateful Anglo-Saxon. I hope the time has not come when one must apologize for being an American."

With due respect for the senior Senator from Georgia, I must say that for its own good our nation must live by the ideals it has professed from the day the Declaration of Independence affirmed that all men—and not just the Anglo-Saxons—are created equal. Certainly of all American ideals none is more genuinely ours or more eloquently proclaimed by our present leaders. Yet it is exactly this American belief in the primacy of the individual as against his membership in any group that our immigration laws now flout. In the 1920's this was a mistake; in the 1950's it may lead to tragedy.

What Must Be Done

The first step on the road to sanity is to acknowledge that there can be no return to unregulated, unrestricted immigration. Those who still claim that this is the aim of the opponents of our present immigration laws lie, and they know it. The time when immigrants could come when they themselves decided to seek a new life in America and when each year the total number of arrivals was left to chance—that time is gone forever. It is gone not only because of our immigration laws but also because in every civilized country there are trade unions and in varying degrees all governments feel responsible for the welfare of their citizens. Every government now exerts control over the outflow as well as the inflow of migrants. Our government, because of its position of leadership, must establish its own standards.

Moreover, the problem of displaced persons—there are still distressingly large numbers of them—as well as that of overpopulated countries, cannot be solved by anyone nation alone, even with the most humanitarian intentions. These problems must be the object of international negotiations, with each nation that is in condition to help or in need of help doing its share. There are already several international agencies at work on these problems. The most important of them is the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, made up of twenty-six nations. Incidentally, the two American representatives at the recent Geneva meeting of this committee were, of all people, Congressman Walter and Mr. McLeod.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER has stated forcefully on any number of occasions that our immigration policy must be revised. I myself was particularly impressed by his speech at the Alfred E. Smith Memorial Foundation dinner on October 16, 1952, when he said:

". . . we must strike from our own statute books any legislation concerning immigration that implies the blasphemy against democracy that only certain groups of Europeans are welcome on American shores." This was not just campaign oratory. I believe it came straight from the President's heart. Recently when asked at a press conference whether he was satisfied with the way the Refugee Relief Act was administered, the President answered squarely, No.

The President alone has the power to move from that "No" to positive actions. In my opinion, he should appoint a bipartisan commission, with representatives from both houses and experts of his own choosing, to study the problem thoroughly and propose basic changes in our immigration laws. It may be said that there have been too many such committees, but they have been precommitted and partisan; this one should draw particular authority from the quality of its membership and the President's unflagging support.

Insulting Entire Continents

Above all, the commission should make the relevant facts known to the public—the facts about the number of immigrants we can put to work and the contribution our country can make in bringing relief to those in dire need of resettlement. There is desperate need that these facts be made known, for the old myths still poison the air. Among the myths, there is that of our people's antagonism to new immigrants. But do the American people really want to shut the door on the rest of the world? Are they really willing to perpetuate this insult to entire continents, Asia and Africa, whose importance in the modern world grows day by day?

Whatever the final solution may be—and there must be a number of acceptable solutions—public discussion is what we need most. For we cannot afford an immigration policy that is inconsistent with both our own economic needs and our position of leadership in the world. There is no reason for us to be afraid of a free and open discussion about immigrants—the very stuff of which this country is made.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, FRIDAY, JANUARY 4, 1957

WASHINGTON

By ROSCOE DRUMMOND

The 298 Steps

If an inter-planetary visitor had dropped in on the United States any time during the year 1956, he could easily have gained the impressions, from glaring headlines and various incidents, that the American people were engaged in a bitter, dead-end controversy over whether a nation, dedicated to the proposition of political equality, can long exist—and may not.

Drummond

Fortunately it would be a false impression. The exact opposite is the truth. The truth is that the American people are engaged in the rewarding process of realizing one of our greatest democratic promises, total political equality under law for all. We are making tremendous headway.

The glaring headlines, telling of a mob threatening Negro children on the way to school, of hooded cross-burners relighting some of their fires of resistance, of some Governors seeking ways to evade the Supreme Court, do not reflect an insoluble problem; they reflect our concentration upon solving the problem.

We are solving it steadily, persistently, visibly, sometimes painfully. In gauging the struggle that still lies ahead it is well to look at some of the reassuring evidence of progress.

The record of progress in civil rights from 1948 to 1957 has been compiled by the American Jewish Committee in New York, which, in so doing, has performed a valuable public service in helping us all to see this problem in perspective. It is an impressive story, factually told. Its central fact is that during the past nine years there have been 298 separate, solid, significant actions—judicial, legislative, administrative and voluntary—taken by Federal, state and municipal government and private groups all advancing and securing equal rights of citizenship in the following ways:

Presidential orders that paved the way for integration in the armed services.

State and local laws barring discrimination on the job, in public housing, and in tax-supported colleges.

Court rulings outlawing racial segregation in public schools and in a wide variety of public accommodations.

Spontaneous actions of private citizens and groups to further political equality.

Here are some of the steps which show American Democracy in action, demonstrating that it has within itself the seeds of adaptation and change and self-reform:

U. S. Supreme Court sets aside death sentence of Georgia Negro because jury was chosen on racial basis.

Democratic state primaries opened to Negroes in Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana and Texas.

U. S. Supreme Court rules compulsory segregation in public schools is unconstitutional.

Moves toward desegregation are initiated in close to 1,000 school districts and units in Southern and border states. By October, 1956, desegregation is under way in 797 school districts affecting 319,000 Negro and 2,000,000 White children. Some 110 of 208 tax-supported Southern colleges now admit Negro students.

Poll of 15,000 Southern college teachers reveals that 70 per cent favor integration in professional and graduate schools.

Big league baseball teams start using Negro players and Pacific Coast League hires first Negro umpire.

Discriminatory advertisements by employment agencies rejected by telephone directories.

Journal of American Medical Association drops designations by race and creed from "situations wanted" advertisements.

Federal District Court removes last restriction on the right of American Indians to vote.

Miami erases color line in its library.

Southern Presbyterian Church votes to absorb colored Presbyteries in white synods.

National Press Club elects first Negro member.

And so forth and so forth.

Much remains to be done and on this point the preface to the American Jewish Committee's incandescent report rightly remarks:

"Time and patience will be required to change practices that have long been the only accepted pattern for millions of Americans. But each passing year makes it increasingly clear that the clock will not be turned back—that America will continue its ever forward march toward 'one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.'"

Dear Seymour:

Many thanks for the clipping from the April 7th Sunday Herald, "Racial Bars Cost Miami Millions in Caribbean Trade." Would it be possible for you to send us an original or make five or six copies for us? We could get a good deal of mileage out of this clipping.

I was terribly disturbed upon hearing what had happened to Ed. Is there anything I can do to help? It sounds like a frame-up to me.

Best personal regards.

Racial Bars Cost Miami Millions in Caribbean Trade

By PAT MURPHY
Herald Staff Writer

KINGSTON, Jamaica — Racial discrimination and practically nonexistent industrial promotion are costing Miami millions of dollars a year in direct business from the Caribbean.

Both points were tossed at the Miami Trade Mission as it swung into this picturesque British island on the last leg of a 14-day goodwill trip to eight Caribbean neighbors.

Trade Minister Wills Isaacs said wealthy Jamaican Negro businessmen are steering away from Miami to do their buying because of color barriers at hotels and restaurants.

Without such barriers, he said Miami's business with Jamaica would increase "400 to 500 per cent and that amounts to millions."

Later, the eight-man trade mission met with officers of the Jamaica Chamber of Commerce who were critical of Miami's neglect in publicising its industrial growth.

The chamber men said that most average Jamaica businessmen still don't know that Miami has something besides tourist facilities.

Miami Mayor Randall N. Christmas, who has been plugging hard and convincingly for greater trade with Miami, said the way is being cleared to solve both problems.

"Miami is becoming more cosmopolitan and our area is the least discriminatory in all the South. I think you will find Miami leading the way in lowering barriers which are detrimental to inter-American trade and goodwill."

Mayor Christmas said he believes both the city and businessmen "will wake up some day and make a more dynamic and fuller presentation of our industrial picture."

The mayor commented to the Jamaican chamber officials that unless Miami sets its sight on selling in the Caribbean the city's young industrial economy will lose out to other cities who are beginning to court Latin businessmen.

The chamber men said Jamaicans are buying goods mostly in New York and Chicago.

Several suggested that Miami should also seek lower freight rates to Jamaica to make trade more attractive.

Mayor Christmas told the group that Miami soon will have a new port and then can force rate-setting agencies to lower rates.

In its tour to eight countries, the eight-man mission has found interest among Caribbean businessmen to do business with Miami.

But at each stop, Miami's lack of a large seaport, high freight rates, and narrow promotional campaigns were cited as reasons now blocking trade.

Harold A. Hayward, vice president of the First National Bank, has told businessmen that Miami industry has not launched a dynamic enough sales program to enter the Caribbean market.

However, Timothy J. Sullivan, of Florida Power and Light, said first signs of what he called "a persistent door-to-door" sales campaign in the Caribbean is being made by Miami businesses.

Man That Segregationists Hate

ATLANTA—(AP)—HAROLD C. FLEMING SLID an inch lower in the chair. Somehow he managed the appearance of a slightly wistful schoolteacher — which was misleading.

"I am a real conformist at heart," he said. "It's just that there are some things in the South with which I can't conform."

As director of the Interracial Southern Regional Council (SRC) he is a shrewd, sharp and tough advocate of the moderate approach to the South's ancient racial problem. He has become one of the men most deeply hated, and perhaps feared, by the South's more rabid pro-segregation groups.

He is a native southerner with an ancestry reaching back into rural Georgia, where he himself once lived. But he goes around saying such things as:

"It is no longer a matter of whether the South must solve its racial problem, but when, how and at what cost, or damage to the economy and the human beings involved."

Among the pro-segregation groups this sentiment amounts to subversion of "the Southern way of life." Some equate such an opinion with communism.

FOR A TIME he and his family nearly suffered a form of social ostracism in the neighborhood. There were rumors floating about that possibly he really was a Communist.

Finally, an exasperated neighbor who had known Fleming from early high school days angrily told a community citizens meeting that they were all nuts, that Fleming was about as Communistic as a hot FLEMING LIVES in suburban Atlanta with his wife and two small boys in a three-bedroom, den and two-bath home which looks like about 50 others.

When he finds time, which is rare, he plays with his two boys, Gary Phillips Fleming, 6, and Anthony Hughes, 13 months.

For Fleming works 12 to 16 hours a day, keeping in touch with council affiliates in 15 Southern states and answering his enormous volume of mail. He coordinates an interracial staff of 12. He even keeps a dictating machine at home.

"He's working," said Jane, "when he isn't sleeping." She also suffers in silent exasperation the fact that 15 minutes after a meal, Fleming probably couldn't for the life of him tell you what he has eaten.

Fleming was born in the Georgia Baptist hospital at Atlanta, July 27, 1922, the son of Lorraine Hulme Fleming and the late Howard Hughes Fleming, vice president of one of Atlanta's largest building material firms.

A large part of his early life was spent in Elberton, Ga., where the Hulmes are known as real Old South folk. The Fleming side of the family came from Oglethorpe County, Ga.

SO HOW DID he wind up where he is?

"I don't know. I guess it goes back to college. I started to college, Harvard, on a scholarship back in 1940."

While he was at Harvard the war broke out and Fleming joined the Field Artillery ROTC. He remained at school until 1943, when he was sent to Ft. Bragg, N. C., and ultimately to Officer Candidate School.

He wound up on Okinawa after the fighting as a captain in charge of a Negro quartermaster company.

"I would say that going out of the South made me aware of the racial problem and I would say that my Army experience made me think about it deeply for the first time. I lived, ate and slept with it every day. You were not only an officer, but above everything else you were the boss White man.

"You couldn't duck the responsibilities. Trying to get a decent shake for your men from the brass above was rough. These men felt keenly the segregation and the fact that they got the short end of the stick.

"On the ship going over our men had the lousiest quarters. They were last in the chow line and this meant they got there after all the good things had run out."

He got back to Atlanta in 1947 and heard of a special writing job with the SRC through Ralph McGill, editor of The Atlanta Constitution and one of the founders of the SRC in 1944.

"I took the writing job for the summer. I had planned to go to New York in September, possibly to work for a publishing company, but then I got interested."

For the author of the once famous "First Epistle to the Selectees," which appeared in the Feb. 18, 1944, edition of the Army newspaper Yank, the situation is slightly ironical.

In that epistle, Fleming wrote: "The wise men [illegible] out the easy details, but only a fool [illegible] emerging as spokesman for moderate point of view in our racial crisis.

Mr. Stanley Leibner
AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
1208 Congress Building
Miami 32, Florida

Dear Stanley:

The proposed clergymen's conference sounds more and more exciting. Obviously, the more widely representative the group, the greater the impact their meeting and pronouncements will have.

As you note in your letter, Seymour asked me if I could talk with some Catholic representative to CCD about getting cooperation from the Catholic Church in Florida in the proposed conference. I talked with several Catholic laymen at the NAIRO Annual Meeting about this and there was almost unaminous feeling that the Bishop of St. Augustine was anything but anxious to participate in inter-faith conferences. This I remembered from my days in Florida.

Several things may be possible, however. The NCCJ, if it is cooperating in this program, might reach him from the national staff level. Louis A. Radelet, Director of their Commission on Community Organizations, is a prominent Catholic layman and might be able to reach the Bishop. Second, it might be possible for Bishop Louttit and the AME Bishop to jointly request his participation or permission for priests to participate. Third, Priests of Holy Orders are more free to participate in such meetings than are parish priests. This brings to mind two things: Barry College; and Jesu which is served by Jesuits. Oh, one other thing, at the Department of Human Relations we used to have a nun, whose name (as I recall) was Mother Mary Joseph, attend meetings. Don Sprague would remember her; she was from St.Therese (probably wrong saint) in the Gables...the scholl connected with the Church of the Little Flower.

I have written Paul Williams, Knight of St. Gregory, about this,too and asked that if he had any good thoughts to write Seymour.

Best regards to Seymour and Bill and to you all seasons greetings.

Dear Mr. Routh:

The concept of a Churchmans conference concerned with the "role of religious organizations in the current crisis" draws substantially nearer. Quite a number of prominent clergyman have signed a joint letter requesting the Governor to come and address them on the conference theme.

At this time, however, we have not made contact with any Catholic clergymen. As Seymour indicated to you in a letter dated October 14, 1957, we are concerned that the Catholic clergy will not participate in such a proposed conference.

Have you ever contacted the representative from the Catholic participant from the C. C. D. meeting? This man (name unknown to us) had indicated he knew nothing of what our activities were on this issue in Miami. We hope you spoke to him and found out the contact people whom he would recommend or the actual involvement by him or others in motivating or mobilizing the Catholic Community on this issue.

I had hoped to get these off to you before this, but the rush of events interrupted my intentions. Sorry. You may keep "A Community Survey Gets Results," but please return "By the People" for it is SRC's file copy.

Dear Fred:

Thanks for coming to my help the other day when I called you from Jacksonville regarding their community audit of 1949. It was helpful in my discussions with some of the people that afternoond and may become the basis for a serious consideration by some of them for a community audit tied into the community audit suggestion by the United Churchwomen and others for such audits to be held in commemoration of the 10th Anniversary of the UN Declaration of Human Rights in December of this year.

For your information I am attaching a copy of a three part program which I recommended to the Public Relations Committee of the Jewish Community Council of Jacksonville. I would be most interested in your reactions to it. Perhaps we can spend a short time together in Atlanta when I come up for the Interagency meeting next week.

Best regards.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR COMMUNITY RELATIONS PROGRAM

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA

MAY 1958

1. The establishment of an informal non-auspices group for purposes of communication, problems solving and program evaluation. Such a group (you can call it "The Thing" or "The Downtown Discussion Club") would be composed of selected individual community leaders who are representative of important areas of community life but not delegates from any organizations. It might include persons active in such organizations as Y. W. C. A., Ministerial Alliance, Social Welfare Council, A. D. L., A. J. Committee, Mental Health Association, University, PTA Council, A. A. U. N., Urban League, United Church Women, Northeast Florida Council on Human Relations, etc. Meetings would be irregularly called by any of the members desiring to discuss matters of importance:-- e.g. the pressures being currently brought against the Y. W. C. A. to disaffiliate from its national organization, the current status of the Urban League in the Community Chest, attacks against the PTA platform regarding their support of the U. N.; suggestions for recommendations in the about-to-be created state advisory boards on civil rights, etc. There would be no voting, officers, or minutes. By such sharing of problems each group would better understand the inter-relatedness of issues discussed and the possibilities of united action. It could give strength to each group which currently presumes no support for it's problems and so fights the common enemy alone or not at all.

2. The establishment of an official county or municipal community relations board. If modeled along the proposals made in Dade County it would be a county ordinance establishing a 15 man commission with a professional staff. Its purposes would be to deal with broad issues of intergroup relations as they are affected by population increases, industrialization, housing dislocations resulting from urban redevelopment, health and welfare needs of minority groups, etc. It could conduct research and establish broad educational programs on community relations issues; investigate reports of intergroup tension; counteract rumors affecting interreligious affairs; and advise various government officials and departments regarding these matters. The proposed Miami Ordinance is attached. Properly handled, it should be adapted to Duval County needs, "sold to a few key leaders who would then privately get support for it from a majority of the commissioners. Then, and only then, should it be presented for official consideration. If there is a chance that the proposal would be defeated it is probably wise not to present it at all.

3. In December of 1958 we will celebrate the 10th anniversary of the U N Declaration of Human Rights. Under the leadership of such groups as the United Church Women and the American Jewish Committee a brochure describing a unique method of observing this anniversary has just been published. The suggestion is that as many communities as possible make an audit of the status of human rights on the local level. The techniques for doing this are fully described in the pamphlet which I am sending under separate cover. Interestingly, apparently unremembered by Jacksonville leaders, a similar survey was made in Jacksonville in 1949 by local citizens assisted by the Southern Regional Council. It is suggested you speak to Davison Dunlap, Mr. Johnson of the Dinsmore Dairy, and Crawford Solomon about this survey in which they were involved. I am getting a copy of this survey for your information. My suggestion is that a new audit be made to show the progress that has been made in the past decade and to indicate current needs. Such a survey should employ the widest possible co-sponsorship which would probably be available if sparked by the United Church Women.

These are obviously long range programs. However, their potential depends upon relatively quick action to capitalize on current interest. The bombings can and should be used as an instrument for getting a continuing concern for improving intergroup understanding. This is possible only for a period of another 2 - 4 weeks. After that Jacksonville will once again be "back to normal". Since normal isn't good enough the above may be a means of helping to make Jacksonville a better place in which to live. I recognize that I have merely outlined some ideas. If they are valid I would be pleased to be of assistance in their implementation.

Dear Fred:

I am attaching a copy of a memorandum to my national office referring to our plans for a community audit to be held in Miami. We will obviously need considerable assistance in order to develop this project. Could you give me some indication of what resources might be available to us. Several questions come to mind:

1. Is it possible that the Southern Inter-Agency Group can lend professional assistance in developing the research guides, etc?

2. Are professional consultants available to us for specific responsibilities before, during, and after the survey?

3. Is money available from any source that you are aware of which can be used to subsidize the cost of this project?

I am leaving July 9th for Bethel, Maine, where I will attend the group dynamics laboratory program at Gould Academy for the next three weeks. Please don't wait for my return, however, but send your information on to Jessica Schwarz here in my office and she will share it with the appropriate individuals.

Many thanks for your help. My best regards.

As a result of plans initiated by me and members of the Chapter Committee on International Affairs, plans have been projected for a community audit of human rights in Dade County. The audit will be along the lines suggested in the guide "In Your Hands."

To date we were able to get Mrs. Stuart Austin, President of the United Church Women of Greater Miami to convene local members of the national sponsors of this program. They agreed to conduct an audit in seven areas: Employment; Education; Public Health; Recreation; Public Accomodations; Government (voting rights, jury service, etc.); and Housing.

All the investigations will be conducted by inter-organizational committees. Each organization will agree to coordinate the research in one area. AJCommittee has already agreed to do this for Education and a planning meeting is already set up.

Resources to be solicited include several departments at the University of Miami, the research staff of the Welfare Planning Council and the professionals of participating groups.

The groups which are currently represented include:

AJCommittee
AJCongress
Anti-Defamation League
Council of Churches
Congregational Church
Dade County Council on Community Relations
Roman Lutheran Club
Miami Hebrew Society
Miami Latin Center
Nat'l Council of Negro Women
St. Philips Episcopal Church
Trinity Methodist Church
United Church of Church
United Nations Association
United Nations Church Women
Women's International League for Peace and Freedom
Women's Society of Christian Service
YWCA - Murrell Branch
YWCA

There are still numerous important details to clear up before we get started. Not the least is official agreement on co-sponsorship. My leaving for Bethel provides a big gap in my ability to follow thru but there are some good people involved who should prove of tremendous value.

Incidentally, is any money available - as far as you know - to subsidize this kind of an audit? It would be of tremendous hlep if we could get an idea of where some such help might be obtained.

We, the following ministers and rabbis of Greater Miami, join with 311 of our brother clergymen of all faiths in Atlanta in endorsing the following principles as essential to a solution of the racial problems of the nation:

Freedom of speech must at all costs be preserved.

2.

As Americans and as religious leaders, we have an obligation to obey the law.

3.

The public school system must not be destroyed.

4.

Hatred and scorn for those of another race, or for those who hold a position different from our own, can never be justified.

5.

Communication between responsible leaders of the races must be maintained.

6.

Our difficulties cannot be solved in our own strength or in human wisdom but only through prayer and in obedience to the will of God.

Annual Meeting Huge Success

President Rood Reports

'59 IN RETROSPECT—LOOK AT '60

As the year comes to a close, Col. Nathan B. Rood, president of our AJC Chapter, has written a fine summary and projection. We believe that he should be commended for its preparation—this report surely exemplifies the strong leadership that Col. Rood has exerted since his assuming the presidency a year ago.

During the last 12 months, many matters arose, engaging the attention of the American Jewish Committee—matters of international, national and local import.

1. Jews Behind the Iron Curtain:

The meeting of the A.J.C. leaders with Soviet Deputy Premier, Anastas Mikoyan, on his visit to this country resulted in a formal statement by the Soviet authorities that they did not intend to revive the Jewish settlement in Biro-Bidzhan.

Jacob Blaustein, an Honorary President of the Committee, was sent on a government mission to Poland to study the economic and community needs of that country.

2. Jews of West Germany:

The Committee called attention to the growing Anti-Semitism in West Germany. In April this resulted in

An Outstanding Event in Chapter's History

GREAT PLANS FOR '60

Under the able leadership of Alvin Cassel, with the cooperation of scores of members who worked untiring at their assignment, with the imaginative direction of the Workshop by Jack I. Green, culminated by a dramatic and spirited speech by Morris Abram of Atlanta, this year's Annual Workshop and Meeting has won the praise of all the membership. Such laurels are well deserved by all those who masterminded the event.

Who but Jack Green would come up with (1) tape recorded conversations with youngsters all over Greater Miami, who unhesitatingly presented youth's ideas on its own problems, and (2) a filmed summary of the Workshop only 90 minutes after it was concluded (with sound, yet!)?

Well attended, the adult members of AJC were especially impressed with the Workshop's youthful but highly preceptive resource people, who all hold positions of responsibility in the University of Miami's student body. Those who fired the imagination of the participants were Jay B. Hess, Henry Edgar, Steve Slepin, David Yellen and Stuart Fabric.

We all owe Jack, his own staff, and all the Workshop workers a debt of gratitude. They truly sparked a clear "Spotlight on Youth."

Moving on to the Annual Meeting, every one who had a hand in the arrangements and the hundreds of details that are taken care of behind the scenes blended their interest and abilities to create an outstanding eveing. Of course, the highlight was the return of Morris Abram, who two years ago set the membership back on its heels and who once again challenged us and moved us with amazing ease. Here certainly is one of the most intelligent statesman in the South today.

Picking up points as he dropped them across the stage with a determined zeal, we gleaned this summary from Leo Mindlin of the Jewish Floridian: Juvenile crime represents a major challenge to the survival of the nation's great cities as centers where decent people can live . . . .

He denied that the statistically low rate of teen-age delinquency reduces its significance it impact on contemporary civilization . . . . Problems of the young among us mirror those of the adult world.

He charged that the majority no longer cares about the third among us who are ill-clothed, ill-housed and ill-fed. He said that these had champions in the '30's; today there is silence . . . .

But it is this third of our population that is slowly taking over our cities, while the privileged flee.

Out of a host of dedicated people, here are the three that pulled the team together to make our annual Workshop-Meeting such a huge success. They are (left to right) Alvin Cassel, overall chairman of the event; Jack I. Green, creative chairman of the workshop; and Morris Abram, dynamic speaker and statesman.

We seek status quo . . . . youth need not look for jobs; jobs seek youth . . . "Among college students today, I find more interest in Freud than in economics."

He discussed rehabilitation and capital punishment and the need for the extensive re-evaluation of our laws and our methods of detections "which must be more scientific than a $300-a-month policeman — frequently a social misfit—can bring to the task."

What are the principal characters of the juvenile offender? The normal youngster testing the limit of his power in normal environments; the youngster made abnormal by abnormal environment; the disturbed, neurotic, psychotic child . . .

Blaming adults for creating circumstances which upset the equilibrium of youth, with special emphasis on material things today, "these children ultimately deduce freedom to be acquisitive. This is crime in its essence, with youthful wrongdoers infiltrating the cities to make of them giant jungles.

"We are permitting new barbarians, who don't want to be barbarians, to sack all our Romes."

The solution? We must approach this indictment of ourselves "with new flights of imagination."

The man, the meeting . . . the whole day . . . SENSATIONAL!

our receiving assurances from the German Federal Republic that that subject would receive serious attention at a forthcoming conference of Ministers of Education.

3. Latin-American Jewry:

Our delegation to Latin America covered an area and approximately 600,000 Jews living in a Catholic-dominated culture. In addition, consideration is being given to a Miami Chapter proposal that a special sociological study be made of Jewish Life in Mexico.

4. Jewish Life in Europe:

The Committee continued its program in collaboration with the Alliance Israelite Universelle and the Anglo-Jewish Association, of further support for the development of religious and cultural lives of various Jewish communities in West Europe.

The close ties between the Committee and the Pro Deo Institute in Rome were further cemented during the past year.

5. Middle East Affairs:

The problem of Jews in North Africa and their interests in the Middle East continued to be our active concern during the past year. In Miami, the Chapter sponsored, in conjunction with other organizations, a special study of Middle East conditions held recently at the University of Miami.

6. Activities in the South:

The problems of integration and segregation, the position of the Jews in the South, the rise of Anti-Semitism,—all received increased attention during the past year.

7. Youth Problems:

Our concern with the problems of youth needs little further elaboration. The Committee is actively engaged in the research of and preparation for the coming Youth Conference called by President Eisenhower for the Spring of 1960. Our Chapter has been responsible for some of the key recommendations which will be made by the Florida State delegation to the National Conference.

8. Scientific Research:

The American Jewish Committee continued its never ending scientific approach towards the solution of social problems.

9. Improving Inter-Group Understanding:

Believing that a harmonious community can best solve its general problems, A. J. C. has continued its work with other agencies such as the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the National Education Association, The American Association for the United Nations, the Y.M. and Y.M.C.A. and many others, both sectarian and non-sectarian, in promoting inter-group understanding.

10. Teaching of Religion in Schools:

With a continuing sensitivity for the need to handle the Church-State problems with a minimum of dislocation in community relations, we have endeavored to seek the elimination of religious activities from the public schools.

11. Jewish Attitude Studies in Miami:

Long aware that the way in which people regard themselves affects the way others regard them, we have instituted surveys of Jewish attitudes in key communities of the United States. One of the most ambitious of these studies has been undertaken by us in Miami and will be completed during the coming year.

Our primary interest is not so much with the problems themselves, but also with their causes—not so much with individual incidents as they arise, but with the hidden sparks that cause them to generate. We are concerned not so much with what is happening to us, but what may happen to our children. We "dig" deeply to ascertain these causes and we design our programs to eliminate or prevent these causes. We gear ourselves to long range programs designed to promote better understanding between peoples, groups and cultures; designed to eliminate discrimination in employment, housing, social groups and fraternities; designed to afford every American, regardless of background or belief, equality of opportunity.

Such goals may to many seem hopeless of attainment. But goals such as they have been crossed before and will continue to be crossed.

To do so we must continue to enlist the voluntary services of people dedicated to the same beliefs, willing to devote an important measure of their time and effort. We must develop leaders and thinkers who are trained to recognize the causes of group discontent and friction and who know the techniques used in the eradication of evil causes. Ours is a group movement involving people of good will who are interested in human betterment, who realize that Democracy cannot be taken for granted but must be cared for with a singular devotion in order to be preserved.

These were our aims in 1959. These will continue to be our guide posts in the future.

Specific tasks for our Chapter in 1960? Yes, just to list a few:

1. More active participation by the Advisory Board in the affairs of our Committee.

2. A study of the cultural, social and economic conditions of the Latin-American people in our area.

3. A study of Anti-Semetic undertones in the various high schools in our area.

4. Increased participation of our membership in committee functions, in our discussion groups, and in our humanitarian concerns.

5. Continued insistence in the creation of an official County Community Relations Agency.

6. Greater activity toward the elimination of discrimination in housing, employment, social groups, fraternities, et cetera.

7. Amelioration of the many problems of our migrant labor population.

Election Summary

OFFICERS, EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE NAMED

As a traditional part of the Annual Meeting, the membership elects the AJC leadership for the coming year.

The complete slate of officers is found on the masthead of this issue. Among those named to the Executive Committee, following the recommendation of the Nominating Committee headed by Charlie Finkelstein, were: Alvin Cassel, Leo A. Chaiken, Mrs. Charles Finkelstein, Allen I. Freehling, Melvyn B. Frumkes, William E. Gladstone and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Goldstein.

Also, Jack I. Green, Jerome G. Greene, James R. Katzman, Irvin Korach, Mrs. Jane B. Leeds, Raymond Lewis, Seymour B. Liebman, Ernest J. London, Robert Macht and Herbert L. Markow.

And, Mrs. A. Herbert Mathes, Van Myers, Rabbi Joseph R. Narot, Lee Ruwitch, Admiral H. R. Sobel (Ret.), Mrs. Bernard R. Stevens and Richard Wolfson.

The Executive Committee convenes once a month and many of its meetings are open to the general membership. Those wishing to attend should contact the office for further details.

Plan to Attend One

Workshop Set—Religion In Public Schools

Audrey (Mrs. Charles) Finkelstein, chairman of the education committee, who was recently elected president of Dade County Girl Scout Council, has announced that January 11th should be saved by all of us for an important event.

On that evening, there will be three concurrent workshops on "Religion in the Public Schools" in which speakers and panelists will appear from AJCommittee, AJCongress and the ADL.

Sponsored by the Joint Advisory Committee, the 8 o'clock sessions will be held at Temple Beth Sholem on Miami Beach, Beth David Congregation in southwest Miami and Congregation of Monticello Park in North Miami Beach.

"Members," says Audrey, "especially parents of children in our Dade County schools, are urged to attend the workshop in their neighborhoods. I cannot overstress the importance of this meeting."

Now's Your Chance to Work

COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN APPOINTED

AJC President Nathan B. Rood has announced the names of committee chairmen, who will serve during the new year.

In announcing these appointments, Col Rood urges all the membership to give serious consideration as to which committee seems most interesting; then contact the office and volunteer to serve.

Every committee needs your help —the chairmen can't do the job assigned to them without strong backing and support.

Here's a resume of the appointments: David R. Hochberg, budget; Melvyn B. Frumkes, civil liberties; Mrs. Nathan B. Rood, discussion groups; Mrs. Charles Finkelstein, education; Irvin Korach, housing; and Charles Finkelstein, Jewish Attitudes Survey and social discrimination.

Also Mrs. Bernard Stevens, Jewish communal affairs; Lee Ruwitch, mass media; Mrs. David P. Catsman and Mrs. James R. Katzman, program; Mrs. Louis F. Rogel, telephone; and James R. Katzman, youth; Mr. Seymour Liebman, international affairs; Mr. Stuart Simon, church-state affairs; Mrs. Peritz Scheinberg, annual meeting arrangements; Mr. Allen Freehling, Satellite; Mr. Herbert L. Markow, fact-finding.

Basic Education

With all the current fuss about "frills" versus basic education in this country, it's interesting to learn what Eskimo youngsters in Thule, Greenland, are studying these days. They're learning the three R's, of course, reports the National Parent-Teacher. But in addition, they study kayak building, dog-team driving, harpooning, the use of firearms, and the sewing of skins.

And we thought "life-adjustment classes were only for "higher" civilizations.

Charles Finkelstein Reports

Jewish Attitudes Survey

The survey of Jewish attitudes, under discussion for over a year, has emerged from the planning stages and is now actually under way.

Charles Finkelstein, Chairman of the Survey Committee, reports that interviewers are out in the field obtaining answers from several hundred Jewish residents of Dade County.

The survey here parallels a number of similar surveys conducted by AJC in other communities in other sections of the country. Our study will therefore be adding another section to the picture that AJC is gradually drawing of the attitudes, beliefs and practices of Jews throughout the United States. It will also serve as a basis for our own program planning —and that of other Dade County Jewish organizations and institutions —so it will conform to the realities of local Jewish patterns, rather than guesses or assumptions.

Mr. Finkelstein paid tribute to the intensive efforts made by the members of his committee and its various subcommittees. Mrs. Leo Ackerman headed a group which articulated the particular concerns and issues in Greater Miami which were later incorporated into the questionnaire by sociologists of the AJC national staff. Herbert Markow gathered vast amounts of population data which provided the facts upon which the sample design was evolved.

Mrs. Jean C. Lehman, recruited, and is leading the twelve captains and 65 interviewers who are conducting the interviews. Manheim Shapiro, Director of National AJC's Jewish Communial Affairs Department, conducted six two-hour training sessions for these interviewers in the last week. Mrs. Charles Leeds will head the coding operation which will convert the responses to the questionnaires into numerical terms which can then be tabulated by IBM machines.

It was predicted that the survey findings will have great significance for many organizations in the community. This has happened in other communities where such surveys were conducted. The Chapter regards the study as a service to the community and will be pleased to make relevant data available to temples and synagogues, Federation, men's and women's organizations and Jewish centers for appropriate use by them when the final tabulations and analysis are completed.

Discussion Groups Roundup

THEY'RE MEETING ALL AROUND THE TOWN

Discussion groups are "going like '60" (no pun intended) and we hope that all membership will join at least one of these informative, provocative and stimulating groups.

Knowing that it would be impossible for each member to attend every group's sessions, the chairmen are preparing reports that will be summarized in issues of the SATELLITE.

Before giving you the recap, we again urge that you call the office to find the schedule of the discussion group nearest your home. We guarantee some evenings you'll never forget!

HENDRIK BERNS COVERS "THE MIDDLE EAST AND PEACE"

Gloria Kramer reports that Hendrik Berns, well known Miami News writer, gave an in-depth summary of the Middle East today, as he served as resource for a group meeting at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Robert Hyams.

In addition to reviewing last month's Israeli elections, in which 24 parties were on the ballot, an election that was precipitated by the German-Israel arms deal, Mr. Berns guided the group in a heated discussion on Israel, its influence on peace in the Middle East and its relationship to all the world's Jewry.

JOHN B. ORR—"THE PRACTICAL AND PRACTICING LIBERAL"

Under the supervision of Dr. and Mrs. Jerome A. Kramer, who are really coming up with some tremendous programs, John B. Orr was invited to meet with a group at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Beer.

Mr. Orr's definition of liberals: "people who are least resistant to change." He cited Britain as a country willing to experiment and went on to say that only in a nation where there is freedom and willingness to experiment can a sound government continue.

The former State legislator's beliefs and experiences gave rise to an unforgettable discussion in which all the group pitched in.

SUE STEVENS—"GOVERNMENT CENSORSHIP OF PUBLIC MEDIA"

Recently returned from an AJC seminar at Chattanooga, Sue (Mrs. Bernard) Stevens ably led a group discussion on "Censorship by Government of Groups of Public Media; e.g., Radio, Television, Motion Pictures and Literature." They met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Schainuck.

The group became familiar with the problems presented by reviewing several case histories. Many members felt that there should be some supervision of the media, lest minority groups suffer. However, no one suggested the suppression of a difference of view or the presentation of a doctrine.

It was concluded by the group, which is coordinated by Mel Frumkes, that any government censorship might be bad because of the possible danger stemming from an over-zealous public official's action in doing his job as censor.

Annual Membership Reception

Robinsons Invite Us All!

The entire membership of our Chapter, including all those whom you consider to be prospective members, have been invited to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Leo Robinson on Sunday afternoon, April 23rd.

This is an annual event which has always been an exciting part of our overall program. We enthusiastically look forward to seeing all our members and their guests. Our special thanks to our gracious host and hostess, Leo and Elsie Robinson.

Remember, that's Sunday afternoon, April 23rd.

Priscilla Has Date With Stork

Welcome, Gail Silverman

On behalf of all the members of the American Jewish Committee may we say a fond farewell to Priscilla Perry who served for the past year as Executive Assistant and is now eagerly awaiting the birth of her second child.

We wish to welcome at this time Mrs. Leonard Silverman who will be replacing Priscilla. Gail is a graduate of the University of Miami having majored in Psychology and has been active in the community. We all look forward to meeting Gail and working with her.

Plan To Be With Us On May 1st

DR. PAUL VIETH WILL SPEAK

The Jewish Communal Affairs Committee of The American Jewish Committee, chaired by Mrs. Bernard Stevens, is pleased to announce a meeting of unusual interest on Monday evening, May 1, 1961, at 8:00 p.m. at the Du Pont Plaza Hotel. All Jewry in the Greater Miami area is invited.

DR. VIETH

Dr. Paul Vieth, Horace Bushnell Professor of Christian Nurture at Yale University and head of the faculty committee which supervised research for the "Yale Study" to determine the degree of bias in Protestant school texts, will be the principal speaker. The "Yale Study," you will recall, was featured in the March 14th issue of Look magazine in an article entitle "The Roots of Bias," by Bishop James A. Pike.

The survey was conducted under the auspices of the Yale Divinity School. It was conceived by the American Jewish Committee for the purpose of determining whether the church-classroom is a possible breeding ground for negative intergroup attitudes. The study, seven years in the making, was completed in May, 1959. It is the most thorough undertaking of its kind, covering over 120,000 units from religious school curricula materials.

Dr. Vieth will discuss the study, its findings, implications and results to date. After Dr. Vieth's remarks, he will be questioned by three panel members representing the educational, public information and medical professions. The panelists will be Mr. Louis Schwartzman, Director of the Bureau of Jewish Education; Mr. Leo Mindlin, editor of the Jewish Floridian; and Dr. Marcia Klein, psychiatrist. Following a brief intermission during which the audience at table buzz sessions will discuss the problems presented earlier, Dr. Vieth will answer written questions presented from the floor.

Arrangements for the evening have been made by Mrs. Jerome Hofmayer. A nominal charge of $1.00 per person

They Were Mighty Successful

Chapter Activities Report

We hope you didn't miss our three outstanding events of March. On the 26th, Mr. and Mrs. David Hirsch were hosts at a cocktail party and buffet dinner for prospective members at their home, the Carleton Terrace Apartments. The evening was a huge success, with many new members joining our rolls.

March 28 was the date of a provocative panel discussion arranged by our Hollywood discussion group under the leadership of Mrs. Ruth Berger. More than 170 people turned out to view the film "Destiny's Tot," an adaptation of a case history from the late Dr. Robert Lindner's book "The Fifty Minute Hour." After seeing the film, the audience participated in a discussion led by a panel of experts including our own Seymour Samet, Rabbi Joseph Narot, and Dr. Alan Lipton.

Our own Miami discussion group committee, chaired by Mrs. Helene Berg, were hosts to a similar group at the Du Pont Plaza Hotel on the following evening, March 29. Panel discussants, moderated by Dr. Peritz Scheinberg, were Mr. Leon Fisher of the Jewish Family and Children's Service, Mrs. Audrey Finkelstein, chairman of the Dade County chapter, Girl Scouts of America, and Dr. George Jacobson, a practicing psychiatrist.

If you had to miss these noteworthy events, perhaps you can join us in coming affairs we have planned for you in April and May.

YOU ARE INVITED TO A BAR MITZVAH OBSERVANCE

Honoring the 13th Anniversary of the Establishment of the State of Israel.

This will be a county-wide celebration, presented under the auspices of the Zionist Council of South Florida and the community's leading cooperating civic, religious and national organizations.

This thrilling event will take place at the Deauville Hotel, Saturday, April 22, 1961, 8 P. M. A Bar Mitzvah service is planned, and supper will be served. There will be very fine entertainment as well.

Plan to join with the Jewish Community of Greater Miami so we may truly share this "simcha" together!

SUGGESTED STATEMENT OF VIEWS ON JEWISH COMMUNAL ORGANIZATIONS

The annual meeting in New York, April 28-30, will be attended by our delegation: Seymour Samet, Dr. Joseph Weidberg, William Apte, Mrs. Robert Berger, Mrs. Charles Leeds, and Mrs. Bernard Stevens. The Office would like your reactions to the following statement, so the delegates can present them at the meeting.

A distinctive characteristic of American civilization is the freedom and encouragement it affords its citizens to organize into voluntary groups to pursue diverse interests. This pattern of association enriches American society by facilitating the contribution of ideas, culture and services. Through voluntary affiliation with groups of his choice, each person is afforded the opportunity to fulfill his particular aspirations in a manner consistent with his individual outlook.

Jews in the United States have availed themselves of this situation, which provides them at one and the same time with unprecedented freedom of meaningful group association and with equality as American citizens. In the more than 300 years of Jewish communal life in the United States, Jewish religious, philanthropic and cultural activities have flourished. Jews have a common bond in their religion and their historical heritage. But like all other Americans, we differ among ourselves in religious practises, economic views, political philosophy, and world outlook. We differ in our attitudes. We differ in our ideologies.

In keeping with the Amercian pattern, Jews with diverse aims and outlooks have formed organizations and established institutions of their choosing. This diversity of communal effort has contributed to the vitality of Jewish group life in America, and by affording the opportunity for multiple points of contact within the general community, has stimulated participation of Jews in all phases of American life.

Any attempt to create a central authority among Jews in the United States would be contrary to the American experience and would militate against effective social action. The freedom of individual members of organizations to determine their own course of conduct is curbed by compelling them to surrender the responsibility for managing their own affairs. Centralized control by others of the activities of Jewish national organizations and their local counterparts reduces their vitality and diminishes their creativity. A unitary concept of Jewish community organization is as unrealistic as it is false in its premise. It must, and inevitably does, create a harmful image of the Jewish group as representing a separate enclave in the life of America.

We reject the principle of centralized control, whether it be in the name of "Jewish Unity" or of "efficiency." We maintain the right to abstain from any such practice and shall resist all pressures for participating therein. We shall continue to insist that groups of Jews have both the right and the duty to organize themselves to achieve the ideals and purposes they cherish; and that they shall do so free from any external control, except the power of persuasion, by other groups who may hold different views.

Consonant with this, we firmly believe in cooperative efforts on the part of our various communnal organizations to provide on a voluntary basis, for exchange of information and ideas, fruitful consultation and constructive collaboration in agreed-upon specific matters. This we have welcomed and this we shall continue to welcome.

UM Action Taken

Letters Sent To Board

Dear Mr. Mahoney:

The decision of the Board of Trustees of the University of Miami to admit all eligible students regardless of race has set a high moral standard for all law abiding citizens of Florida. The Greater Miami Chapter of the American Jewish Committee wishes to commend the Board for this action. Their example will assist our community to live democracy more fully and will encourage the policy making groups in other organizations to follow your excellent example.

We of the American Jewish Committee for over 50 years have been concerned with the education of citizens so that they may function more effectively in a democratic society. If our experience in this area can be of guidance to your staff in the implementation of your new policy, please feel free to call upon us.

Sincerely,
David B. Fleeman, President

"THE UNTRIED CASE"

By Herbert B. Ehrmann

Reviewed by Victor Reuther

If this book does nothing else it should lay to rest the idea that lawyers are unemotional individuals more interested in legal abstractions than in human values. Herbert B. Ehrmann is a Boston attorney who underwent a soul-shaking experience shortly before the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti. Retained as co-counsel for the two men after their conviction for the South Braintree robberly and murders, he dedicated himself completely to a search for the truth. Finally, after an investigation of almost unprecedented thoroughness, he came up with apparently clear evidence that his clients were innocent. One is inevitably reminded of the Dreyfus Case revelations.

Unfortunately, Ehrmann's facts were weighted by Massachusetts jurists who had already made up their minds that the defendants were guilty. Today the author remains deeply grieved that he and his associate were not permitted to take the facts before a jury at a new trial. Many others have shared his feeling. Joseph B. Ely, who was governor of Massachusetts shortly after the Sacco-Vanzetti execution, told Ehrmann, "Before I read your new book I had some doubt as to the guilt of Sacco and Vanzetti. When I had finished, I had no doubt of their innocence."

Probably the majority of readers will agree with Governor Ely. Ehrmann's account of his investigation of the notorious Morelli gang as the probable perpetrators of the crime for which Sacco and Vanzetti died, is both fascinating and convincing. He gives details of the occurrence, tells who drove the murder car, who sat next to him, who else was in the automobile. It is hard to escape the feeling that the book contains the true story behind one of the great miscarriages of justice.

At this distance from the anti-anarchist hysteria which enveloped Massachusetts at the time, it is difficult to understand how any court could have refused a new trial. It is sadly evident, however, that a judge can succumb to prejudice as readily as other men unless he is deeply committed to the principles of legal justice. Happily, we have recently observed American courts adhering to those principles in the face of immense pressures. But even in that era, this could also have been the case. The late Joseph N. Welch says in his introduction, "I have always thought that the great tragedy of the Sacco-Vanzetti case was that it happened to be assigned to Judge Thayer. I think almost any other judge would have granted a new trial."

"The Untried Case" includes an introduction by Edmund M. Morgan, Royal Professor of Law Emeritus, Harvard University; Vanzetti's last statement; and a number of other documents. But perhaps the most telling is a note by Mr. Ehrmann in which he relates an incident involving Justice Edward P. Pierce, a former member of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court that had upheld the conviction. At a Bar Association meeting in memory of William G. Thompson, a great advocate with whom Ehrmann was associated in the appeals, Judge Pierce came up to Ehrmann after he had delivered a tribute to Thompson. During the various appeals there had never been any indication that any of the judges had misgivings. But this is how Ehrmann describes Judge Pierce's reaction to his recital of Thompson's unflagging efforts for Sacco and Vanzetti: "As the proceedings were concluded, I saw the Justice approaching me, apparently under the stress of a powerful emotion. The tears wer pouring down his cheeks. To my amazement he grasped my hands warmly and said in a rather broken voice, "Thank you! Thank you! Thank you!"

For Your Library Shelf

"The Bayville Survey"

The Greater Miami Chapter of the American Jewish Committee, with the guidance of Manheim S. Shapiro, director of AJC's Jewish Communal Affairs Department, completed in 1960 a survey of the attitudes and activities of Jews in Dade County, Florida (the Greater Miami Area). A summary of the highlights of this survey was published in a series of four articles in THE JEWISH FLORIDIAN of Miami. The Greater Miami Chapter of AJC has now reprinted this series of articles in booklet form.

Copies may be obtained at 15c each at the office.

As A Public Service

Speakers Bureau Formed

As a service to the many organizations which are now formulating their program plans for the coming year, the Greater Miami Chapter of the American Jewish Committee has chosen this time to announce to the Jewish community the establishment of a Speaker's Bureau under the chairmanship of Mrs. Robert Berger. A group of AJCommittee members have been trained as speakers and discussion group leaders on a series of subjects which have grown out of a scientific Survey of Jewish Attitudes conducted by AJCommittee in Dade County. This study has stimulated a wide-spread community interest in attitudes held by Jews toward themselves and their Christian neighbors.

Speakers and discussion leaders on the following five subjects are now available:

1. "Who Is A Good Jew?"
2. "Is Jewish Behavior A Factor in Anti-Semitism?"
3. "How Do We Regard Our Christian Neighbors — Catholic and Protestant?"
5. "Mirror on Dade County Jews." (The actual findings of the Survey).

In addition to Mrs. Berger, the speakers available include: Dr. Robert Berger, Mrs. Earl I. Brown, Mr. Alfred Boas, Mrs. David P. Catsman, Miss Minnie Feinberg, Mrs. Charles H. Finkelstein, Mr. Aaron Foosaner, Mr. Allen I. Freehling, Mr. Melvyn B. Frumkes, Mr. Jerome G. Greene, Dr. George Jacobson, Mr. Paul H. Klein, Dr. Jerome A. Kramer, Mrs. William Leone, Mrs. A. Herbert Mathes, Mrs. Eileen Meyer, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Perlstein, Mr. David J. Saklad, Dr. Peritz Scheinberg, and Mr. Kenneth Treister.

All requests for speakers may be made by writing the Chapter office or calling FR 3-4749. In order to be assured of thorough preparation for these highly specialized topics, speaker requests should be made at least three weeks in advance of a meeting.

A LETTER TO THE CHAPTER

Dear Friends:

One of man's most ennobling qualities is his concern for other men. It is a quality not confined to any particular religious or national or racial group, nor is it wholly absent from any group. Its highest expression is in its selflessness, in its desire that everyone, everywhere, be treated justly, and that opportunity be denied to no one.

It is one thing to share this concern passively, to feel that if one were in a position of legislative capacity he could and would act to right injustice; but since one isn't, what can one do? Who will hear, he may think, the one small voice protesting the plight of the migrant worker or the slum dweller or the Negro struggling for dignity.

The truth is that the one small voice is the most important sound in the world. It is the murmur from which swells the tempest. It may even be that the tempest comes long after the first wan voices have been stilled, for the crescendo of justice must sometimes wait many years until it is loud enough to be heard. It took one hundred years for Great Britain to make slave trade unlawful, one hundred years of small voices swelling until their whispers became roars that eventually drowned out the sounds of the powerful, entrenched interests that had fostered and perpetuated the slave trade.

If, during those hundred years, those who fought for the abolition of slave trade had been less devoted, if they had grown discouraged and had left the fight, if they had flagged or failed in their zeal, it might well have taken 120 or 140 years for abolition. The point is that a great many of them didn't, and the fact that it took one hundred years is their mark of grandeur, not of ineptitude.

Since perfection is not for the human race, social injustice will always be with us. But since improvement is for the human race, there is hope and there is progress. It remains for us to be vigilant—to nurture and cherish our concern for other men — and to raise our voices in their behalf.

ALFRED BOAS

DR. PAUL VIETH TO SPEAK

For Your Information

This 'n That

Did you see the letter in Forbes magazine, December 15, 1960, page 7)? James Batal of Coral Gables (local spokesman for the Arab League) praising the article "Road Back from Suez" (Forbes, Dec. 1, 1960). What did you think of the letter, and article??

Had you any doubts about the Jewish Attitudes Survey? The Speakers Bureau has been swamped with requests by various organizations in the community.

Interreligious Dialogues—to bring together lay and religious representatives of the major faiths for a free and frank discussion of views or issues which may tend to create or emphasize tensions, not necessarily to resolve problems, but to establish channels of communication, disseminate knowledge, and achieve understanding of each other's point of view on the issues. This is not being sponsored by a particular committee at this time. We haven't a card or coupon for you to mail in, but if you are interested, drop us a line.

LAWYERS (and non-lawyers)—are you redecorating? Our library facilities are cramped for shelf space. Instead of discarding those bookshelves, why not donate them to our office?

Well Done! (In case you weren't there)—to Dr. S. Andhil Fineberg, AJC staff consultant, for his excellent and stimulating presentation on the implications of the Eichmann trial at the largest luncheon meeting we have ever had. More than 100 members and non-members attended. As a result of newspaper publicity and a TV interview of Dr. Fineberg, members of AJC from Canada and North Dakota were in attendance.

Congrats, also, to the Program Committee for their arranging such a fine affair; next time they'll need the Miami Beach Convention Hall!

Fashion Note — Continental lapels have increased the difficulty of buttonholing prospective members so the resourceful Membership Committee has instituted a series of Sunday brunches for prospects. Ladies don't usually wear lapels; will the Membership Committee have a series of teas (—laced, of course)?

Public Health—The newly constituted FFC considered means of effecting a community wide program of "Quarantine" should our favorite bigot come to town. For a do-it-yourself sanitation engineer's kit, contact the office for "Deflating the Professional Bigot", by Dr. S. Andhil Fineberg. (15c).

Decorator's Item—The ladies of the Volunteer's Committee have done a massive rearranging of the furniture in the office. This is not mere experimentation "in decor", but a functional alignment of facilities to accomodate their work in speeding office administration.

HOCHBERG APPOINTED CHAIRMAN

David Hochberg will be Chairman of our Chapter's Ninth Annual Meeting which will be held on weekend of November 18-19, at the Diplomat Hotel. Further arrangements will be announced at an early date. Mark your calendar now for the entire week-end.

Dear Mr. Kellman:

We have been pondering the question which you raised in your letter of June 11th.

We have the same problem that you do with respect to hate literature. There is a tremendous volume of it in circulation, and we get it usually in single copies from members and friends who come across it in the normal course of their activities. It is very difficult to obtain additional copies without ordering them from the publishing groups, which we are reluctant to do.

We would be glad to copy some of these items for you, but the bulk of the material prohibits our offering to copy it all. Perhaps we might be able to help if you could find the time to inventory the items you have on hand thus eliminating duplication in our respective files. Naturally we would be glad to make the material available to any of your staff members who might turn up in Atlanta.

I may add that we have a full time staff member for the summer doing field research on the various resistance movements. When his findings are available - in about three months from now - AJC will most certainly receive a copy of the report.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

We find that the need for the acquisition of facts and data relating to White Citizens' Councils, the Klan and similar movements to be most urgent at this time.

While we get some literature, publications and leaflets, we are sure that we are missing many of local origin emanating from ~~from~~ groups in widely scattered points in the South.

Could you, therefore, see your way clear to arrange for getting such literature for us, by means of securing extra copies or otherwise?

We will be most grateful.

From: A. Harold Murray

I am pleased to inform you that Miss J. Libby Rosen has been assigned a greater responsibility in the area of our publications program and will therefore no longer be servicing your requests to the Community Affairs Department. We are grateful to her for her most helpful cooperation with you which has resulted in making it possible for AJC to meet your needs.

We are pleased to announce that Mr. Isaiah Terman of our professional staff will now direct the handling of requests for information, program materials, community assistance and literature services for the Community Affairs Department. Mr. Terman has been a member of the Community Service Department and the Community Affairs Department for the past 12 years. He is probably well known to most of you since he has visited many of you during the many years in which he has been working with communities in behalf of AJC. I am sure that he will continue to provide the excellent service and cooperation which has been so wonderfully demonstrated by those who have preceded him.

Will you therefore please note in your records that all future requests for service to the Community Affairs Department of the American Jewish Committee are to be sent to MR. ISAIAH TERMAN at the above address. Will you kindly correct your mailing lists accordingly.

COMMUNITY AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

DR. S. ANDHIL FINEBERG, Community Relations Consultant

"FEARS AND PREJUDICE" by Selma Hirsh

This condensation of Selma Hirsh's book, "The Fears Men Live By", as a Public Affairs Pamphlet should be useful in a wide variety of situations. The following may help to refresh your memory of the subject matter:

> The Fears Men Live By, by Selma Hirsh, is a distillation of the findings published in a series of volumes, Studies in Prejudice. This series of studies brought together the findings of psychiatrists, psychologists, social and political scientists, after years of painstaking research. These studies provided a powerful body of evidence on the origins of prejudice and on the nature of the prejudiced person. In The Fears Men Live By, the author has translated this highly technical material into the language of our everyday life. How the authoritarian personality functions, the mechanisms which the prejudiced personality employs, and ways in which we can help to reduce the fears men live by are discussed in non-technical language.

In its present form under the title Fears and Prejudice, the possibilities for distribution are greatly expanded. Anyone with the equivalent of a high school education -- North, South and borderline -- should be considered a potential reader. Jews and non-Jews, especially those who are involved in intergroup relations, should be familiar with the pamphlet's contents. Its uses in group discussions will be obvious to you.

The pamphlet is available from AJC at 20¢ per copy; in quantities of 100 and over, 17¢ per copy; special prices for orders in excess of 500.

Subject: Final 1957 Report on Developments with Respect to Civil Rights Legislation at the State Level

On March 19, 1957, and again on May 31, 1957, we reported on developments with respect to state civil rights legislation up to May 25, 1957. This memorandum supplements our earlier ones and will bring you up to date on such developments through August 31, 1957, by which date almost all state legislatures had adjourned.

1957 was a very productive year for state civil rights laws. Colorado and Wisconsin strengthened their existing FEP laws, Colorado by extending the enforcement provisions to private employment heretofore exempt from such provisions and Wisconsin by adding enforcement machinery to its existing educational-type FEP law. In addition, Colorado brought violations of its civil rights law with respect to places of public accommodation under the jurisdiction of its existing Anti-Discrimination Commission.

Massachusetts, New Jersey, Oregon and Washington passed laws to prohibit discrimination in the sale or rental of publicly aided housing. All of these states vested jurisdiction over these new anti-discrimination laws in their existing commissions against discrimination. In addition, Oregon and Washington, like Colorado, strengthened their statutes prohibiting discrimination in places of public accommodation by vesting enforcement jurisdiction in their existing commissions against discrimination. Minnesota, while failing to pass a bill which would have prohibited discrimination in publicly aided housing, enacted a bill which declared discrimination in housing to be contrary to the public policy of the state and which created a commission to study and investigate discrimination in the sale or rental of housing accommodations.

California, Illinois and New York passed laws to discourage discrimination in employment in certain narrow fields. Illinois amended its state school code to require school districts to certify that they do not discriminate in the employment of teachers as a condition to securing state aid. California authorized the State Board of Education to establish a commission to assist and advise local school districts in problems relating to racial, religious or other discrimination in the employment of certificated employees. New York enacted a statute prohibiting discrimination in the apprenticeship training program under the joint sponsorship of labor unions and management groups.

Vermont passed a law prohibiting racial or religious discrimination in places of public accommodation. Colorado and South Dakota repealed their statutory prohibitions on interracial marriages, while Missouri repealed its statute providing for segregated schools and eliminated color as a factor in computing school attendance. Missouri also established a state commission on human relations. Wyoming enacted a statute which provides that "no person of good deportment shall be denied the right of life, liberty, pursuit of happiness, or the necessities of life because of race, color, creed or national origin."

In the following pages we have again classified state legislative developments under the headings: Education, Employment, Housing, Public Accommodations and Miscellaneous. We have used asterisks (*) to indicate reports on matters which were first mentioned in our earlier memoranda.

Since "Southern School News" reports in great detail each month on legislation, litigation and community action related to desegregation developments in the 17 southern and boarder states and in the District of Columbia, we have omitted from this memorandum any reports on legislative developments in education in those states.

No. 219

EDUCATION

California: AB 758*, to bar fraternities and sororities which restrict their membership on the basis of race or religion from state college campuses, was permitted to die in the Assembly Committee on Education.

Connecticut: The Legislature adjourned on June 5, 1957 without taking any action on SB 571* or HB 1852* which would have prohibited discrimination in educational institutions on the grounds of race, color, religion or national origin.

Illinois: The Senate defeated HB 474*, which would have permitted boards of education to consider race and color in setting school district lines so as to achieve integrated schools, and which had passed the House on May 1.

Missouri: HB 163*, repealing the statute requiring segregated schools and eliminating color as a factor in computing school attendance, was signed into law by Governor James T. Blair, Jr.

Oregon: HB 770* which would have prohibited discrimination in higher education, died in Committee when the Legislature adjourned on May 21, 1957.

Pennsylvania: The Legislature adjourned on June 21, 1957 without acting on SB 736*, which would have established an Educational Opportunities Commission.

EMPLOYMENT

California: After the defeat of AB 2000* (FEPC) by the Senate Labor Committee, the Assembly amended the Senate-passed SB 1955 (which dealt with the employment of minors) by attaching prohibitions against employment discrimination to it, and passed it on June 11, 1957, by 53 to 13. The bill then went to the Senate (bypassing the hostile Labor Committee) for concurrence. On June 18 the Senate voted by 21 to 13 to kill SB 1955 with its fair employment provisions.

SB 2566* passed the assembly and was signed by Governor Goodwin Knight on July 10, 1957. It authorizes the State Board of Education to establish a Commission to assist and advise local school districts in problems relating to racial, religious or other discriminations in the employment of certificated employees.

The other bills to outlaw discrimination in employment (AB 2939*, AB 3148* and AB 3372*) failed to reach the floor of the Assembly.

Connecticut: All the bills to strengthen the powers of the existing Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights (HB 304*, SB 417*, SB 655*, HB 295* and HB 1868*) were permitted to die when the Legislature adjourned on June 5, 1957.

Illinois: Governor William G. Stratton signed into law HB 254*, which denies state aid to any district which fails to certify that it does not discriminate in the employment of teachers.

Maryland: FEP legislation* failed of enactment in Maryland when it was permitted to die in committee.

Missouri: HB 161*, to establish FEPC, failed to pass the House prior to adjournment.

HB 164*, to prohibit discrimination in state employment, which had passed the House, was permitted to die in the Senate Committee on Jurisprudence.

New Hampshire: HB 340*, to establish a state commission against discrimination, was referred on July 25, 1957 to the State Judiciary Council, composed of members of the judiciary from all branches of the state courts. The Legislature adjourned. The Judiciary Council will consider the measure while the Legislature is in recess.

Ohio: The two fair employment practice bills* introduced in the House and Senate failed to be enacted.

Wisconsin: S 327*, to provide enforcement machinery for the Wisconsin Industrial Commission to enable it to issue cease and desist orders which could be supported by Court enforcement, passed the Senate on June 3, 1957 and the Assembly on June 5. Both actions were unanimous. Governor Vernon W. Thomson signed it into law on June 28, 1957. Wisconsin thus becomes the thirteenth state with an enforceable fair employment practice law applicable to public and private employment.

The Wisconsin FEP Law, however, now contains one provision of rather ambiguous meaning. In final form, the Legislature provided that if any order issued by the Industrial Commission is "unenforceable against a labor organization in which membership is a privilege, the employer with whom such labor organization has an all-union shop agreement shall not be held accountable under this chapter, when such employer is not responsible for the discrimination." The scope and importance of this provision will have to await judicial interpretation.

HOUSING

California: AB 367*, which would have prohibited discrimination in redevelopment projects and which had passed the Assembly, was permitted to die in the Senate Committee on Government Efficiency and Economy.

Connecticut: The Legislature adjourned without acting on either of the two bills* which would have extended the present jurisdiction of the Commission on Civil Rights to private housing.

Illinois: HB 523*, which would have banned discrimination in the sale or rental of public or publicly-aided housing, and which passed the House, was permitted to die in the Senate.

Massachusetts: S 328*, to prevent discrimination in public or publicly-assisted housing projects, passed the Senate on May 6 and the House on June 4, 1957. It was signed into law by Governor Foster Furcolo on June 7, 1957.

Michigan: A bill* to prohibit discrimination in publicly-assisted housing, failed of passage before adjournment.

Minnesota: The 10-member study commission established by the Legislature to investigate discrimination and segregation in housing accommodations*, was duly appointed by Governor Orville L. Freeman.

New Jersey: A 8*, which prohibits discrimination in FHA-aided housing and vests jurisdiction over this problem in the existing Division Against Discrimination, was signed into law by Governor Robert B. Meyner on June 4, 1957.

Oregon: HB 647*, which prohibits discrimination in the sale or rental of publicly-aided housing and vests jurisdiction over this problem in the Bureau of Labor, was signed into law by Governor Robert D. Holmes on June 11, 1957.

Pennsylvania: The Legislature adjourned on June 21, 1957 without acting on either of the two bills* which would have prohibited discrimination in publicly-assisted housing accommodations.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS

Connecticut: The Legislature adjourned without enacting HB 296* or HB 314*, which would have given the Connecticut Civil Rights Commission power to initiate complaints charging discrimination in places of public accommodation.

Maryland: The series of bills* to prohibit discrimination in places of public accommodation, failed of enactment at the 1957 session of the Lesiglature.

Missouri: HB 162*, to protect all persons in their right to enjoy places of public accommodation, failed of passage.

Nevada: AB 185*, to protect the right of all persons to the use of public accommodations, failed of passage.

New Hampshire: HB 340*, which would have banned discrimination in places of public accommodation, was referred to the State Judicial Council. (See under Employment).

Oregon: HB 646*, which extends the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Labor to complaints of discrimination in places of public accommodations and adds trailer parks and camp grounds to such places, was signed into law by Governor Robert D. Holmes on June 11, 1957.

Utah: HB 87*, which would have prohibited discrimination at places of public accommodation and provided civil penalties for violations, failed to pass the Legislature.

MISCELLANEOUS

California: AB 2690*, to create a Civil Rights Commission, was permitted to die in the Assembly Committee on Rules. AB 3687*, to promote the establishment of city and county agencies to foster better intergroup relations, was permitted to die in the Assembly Committee on Government Efficiency and Economy.

Delaware: HB 51*, to create a State Human Relations Commission, failed to be reported out of committee by adjournment date.

Illinois: HB 434*, to amend the Election Code to allow for absentee voting by those unable to vote at the polls on election day because of religious observance, passed both houses but was vetoed by Governor William G. Stratton.

Missouri: HB 125* creates a State Commission on Human Rights. The bill was weakened in the Senate by curtailing the investigative powers given to the Commission. It was signed into law by Governor James T. Blair, Jr., on June 18, 1957.

Wisconsin: S 276*, which would have eliminated "race" from the descriptive information required on applications for drivers' licenses, was killed by the Senate Committee on Highways.

The last issue just arrived. I note that the envelope was sealed with scotch tape; I wonder if this was done in your office or is someone tampering with the mail?

I look forward to seeing you at the annual NAIRO meeting in Pittsburg. I hope things go well with you.

All good regards.

SUBJECT: Attorney General of Wisconsin rules released time bill unconstitutional.

DATE: July 22, 1959

DIGEST: Proposed legislation to authorize the release of pupils from public schools for religious instruction outside the school is in violation of the Wisconsin State Constitution. Any released time plan which uses school regulations to facilitate attendance for religious instruction, whether such instruction is on or off school property, is of doubtful validity. Similarly, any released time plan under which school authorities cooperate with religious groups by releasing the children for religious instruction is of doubtful validity if the children remain under the technical jurisdiction and discipline of the public school.

On June 24, 1959, Attorney General John W. Reynolds, of the State of Wisconsin, directed a ruling to the members of the 1959 Wisconsin State Assembly, with respect to the constitutionality of Bill No. 281, A., relating to released time from public schools for religious instruction.

The bill would amend the compulsory school attendance laws by adding a provision which would permit local school boards to allow pupils with written permission of their parents to be absent from school up to one hour per week during required school periods, to obtain religious instruction outside the schools under a qualified instructor. The bill provides that the supervisor of such religious instruction must report monthly to the principal of the public school the names of the pupils who attended these religious instruction classes. The bill also provides that the released time hour shall be fixed by the school board, and that the board may deny the privilege to pupils who absent themselves from religious instruction after requesting the privilege.

The Attorney General first considered whether the proposed legislation was consonant with the Federal Constitution. After referring to the United States Supreme Court decisions in the McCollum and Zorach cases, the Attorney General concluded that on the basis of the latter case, a released time program such as that contemplated by the bill in question, does not violate any provisions of the Federal Constitution as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court.

The Attorney General next considered the bill under the provisions of the Wisconsin State Constitution governing freedom of religion. He quoted Article 1, section 18, which provides that the right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed, that no man shall be compelled to attend or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministries against his consent, and that no control of, or interference with the rights of conscience shall be permitted. The section also provides that no preference shall be given by law to any religious establishments or modes of worship, and that no money shall be drawn from the State treasury for the benefit of religious societies or religious or theological seminaries. Also cited by the Attorney General was Article 10, Section 3 of the Wisconsin State Constitution which provides that the legislature shall, by law, establish district schools, and that such schools shall be free from any sectarian instruction.

The Attorney General pointed out that "the language in the Wisconsin Constitution is more restrictive, definitive, and explicit on the question of State-Church relationship than the Federal Constitution." He noted that the Wisconsin Supreme Court and his own predecessors in office have stated that the Wisconsin Constitution provides for the strictest "separation" of state and church in the Union.

The Attorney General then reviewed several decisions of the Wisconsin Supreme Court with respect to religion in the public schools. From these decisions he concluded that the Wisconsin public schools can have nothing to do with religion in any respect whatever, for they are as completely secular as any of the other institutions of the State in which all people, alike, have equal rights and privileges.

He quoted from one decision as follows:

> "The clause that 'no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein' was inserted ex industria to exclude everything pertaining to religion. They are called by those who wish to have not only religion, but their own religion, taught therein 'Godless schools.' They are Godless, and the education department of the government is Godless, in the same sense as the executive, legislative, and administrative departments are Godless....The only object, purpose, or use for taxation by law in this State must be exclusively secular." State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board, 76 Wis. 177, 218.

He also quoted from the same decision the statement, "the connection of church and state corrupts religion, and makes the State despotic."

Finally, the Attorney General cited a 1950 Wisconsin Supreme Court decision, Milwaukee County v. Carter, 162 Wis. 482, which unconditionally affirmed the doctrine of the McCollum case. He concluded that the McCollum rule is the one which is in accord with the Wisconsin Constitution according to the Wisconsin Supreme Court, and that that rule has in no way been modified by the Zorach case so far as the Wisconsin State Constitution is concerned.

The Attorney General then turned to the specific bill under consideration, and concluded that that bill is unconstitutional because it contemplates the use of the "police power of the state" (that is, the truant officer) for reports on the religious activities of children.

He also expressed the view that an element of compulsion is present in the released time program proposed by the bill because the plan intends that those students who do not go to religious instruction will be held in the school building even though it is impossible for them to have the normal class instruction. He indicated that this would have the desired effect of encouraging them to leave their class rooms and join their fellow students in attending religious instruction. This compulsion, he stated, would violate the provisions of Article 1 of section 18 of the Wisconsin State Constitution, which states that no man shall be compelled to attend any place of worship.

The Attorney General next turned to the provision of the proposed bill which grants the public school authorities discretion as to whether to permit pupils with written permission of a parent to be absent for religious instruction "under a qualified instructor." He noted that this provision tends to give preference to those children whose parents belong to organized religions over those who come from homes whose parents do not belong to organized religions. He noted also that the granting of discretion to the school board to release children gives the board the power to rule that pupils may be released if they go to church A but not to church B, because the board may entertain the notion that the instructor of church A is "qualified" but not the instructor of church B. He concluded that obviously the Constitution of the State of Wisconsin denies to the State such control over religion.

Finally, the Attorney General pointed out that in order for a system of released time as proposed under the bill to operate, the time of teachers and school officials, the properties and equipment of the school, and the very school system itself would be used. The teachers and supervisory personnel would have to process the written authorizations and keep records thereof, arrange and effect the departures of released pupils from the school premises, keep records and make reports with respect to attendance at religious instructions, and have additional problems and work in cases of truancy due to the program. Also, the school operation would have to be accommodated thereto by arranging or revamping the ordinary classwork, so that the unreleased pupils would not be given any instruction during the released time but would engage in some other activity lest the released pupils miss the instruction or classwork undertaken during their absence. While he acknowledged that the cost or additional expense attendant upon such a program might not be large in comparison to the total school costs, he did emphasize that there would be a use of school time and property which would involve the expenditure of public school funds for the operation of the released time program. This, he concluded, would also make the released time program objectionable.

The Attorney General ruled, therefore, that based upon the constitutional provisions of the Wisconsin Constitution, and upon the construction given those provisions by the State Supreme Court and his predecessors in office, and for the reasons stated, that the proposed bill violates the Wisconsin Constitution.

SUBJECT: Attorney General of Colorado Inspects Fair Housing Act

DATE: July 23, 1959

DIGEST: The Attorney General of Colorado rules that the provision of the Colorado Fair Housing Act of 1959, which exempts from its coverage sales or leases of premises maintained by the owner as the household of his family, permits an agent of such owner to negotiate a sale or lease without regard to the provisions of the Colorado law barring racial or religious discrimination in the sale or lease of housing.

On June 1st, 1959, the Attorney General of Colorado, Duke W. Dunbar, responded to a query as to whether the exclusion from the recently enacted Fair Housing Law of sales or leases of housing maintained by the owner as the household of his own family was also applicable to such sales or leases if they are negotiated by an agent of such an owner. The Attorney General ruled that under the law an agent handling such a sale or lease was exempt from the coverage of the Act.

He based his ruling on the general law of agency under which a person may do through an agent whatever he is empowered to do himself. He concluded that, since the Act excludes from its provisions premises maintained by an owner as the household of his family, the Act cannot be deemed to apply to the agent of such an owner when he acts on the owner's behalf in connection with the sale or rental of such premises. Hence, a real estate broker or salesman, although licensed by the state, would not be barred from carrying out discriminatory instructions in connection with a sale or lease of premises maintained by an owner as the household of his family.

Enclosed is the first issue of Speaking of People, a selection of human interest briefs which we plan to provide monthly as a public service to radio stations throughout the country.

The list we are using comprises 1500 of the "top market" (i.e., largest audience) stations. Each is being requested to return a postcard indicating desire to receive this item regularly.

When the postcards are returned, we shall be in touch with colleagues in various communities to request assistance in further promoting this program.

In the meantime, please let us have your comments and suggestions on the first issue of Speaking of People. We hope also that you will "feed" us suitable stories derived from your files and experience for inclusion in future issues.

A CENTER OF STUDY AND ACTION TO IMPROVE MAN'S UNDERSTANDING OF MAN

September 1959

Anyone looking for a new hobby? Four men from Larchmont, New York, have found a way to escape the common ailment of suburban boredom. They've joined together to assist townspeople with cash and friendship when hard luck hits. Three businessmen and a rabbi have turned their spare-time attention to the thousand and one problems that come up -- advising widows, straightening insurance tangles, getting hearing aids for the needy, hiring lawyers. The Larchmont Temple group which signs its checks R-I-E-L, Religion in Everyday Life, works anonymously when it helps people in trouble. The three businessmen explain that R.I.E.L. is better than television, golf or grousing -- their former hobbies -- because after helping others, they can enjoy the results all year.

Wounded veteran Al Freeman landed in a Las Vegas hospital. He was starving to death because he couldn't retain a bite of food. Then a nun in the hospital fod him a piece of hot buttered bread -- the first morsel he had been able to digest for days. He lived on that bread for a week, and gratefully told the nursing sister, "This is truly angel bread!" The "angel bread," Al learned later, was baked by a nun appropriately named Sister Angelita. Its recipe had been in her family in Germany for almost 100 years. Al sent loaves to friends and experts all over the country for tasting and testing. They loved it. A machine was devised to mix huge quantities of dough just like the nun's. Freeman set up the Angelita Bread Foundation in Las Vegas and soon was baking more than 2,000 loaves a week. The bread is baked in a Jewish bakery and promoted by a Catholic, a Lutheran, a Methodist, an Episcopalian, a Mormon and a Negro Baptist. Three cents from the sale of each loaf goes to the building fund for St. Rose de Lima, the hospital in which Sister Angelita baked her original bread. When that project is finished, the profits will be used to help other hospitals around the country. All of which proves how much good can come from casting one's bread upon the waters!

Author Kermit Eby was once in Korea working for the Quakers. While walking through a rice field, he noticed some Koreans putting up a scarecrow. Having been raised on a farm, Eby was interested, and went up close to take a look. This oriental scarecrow, strangely enough, had red hair, blue eyes, and the whitest possible face. Eby explains it like this: "Interesting," he says, "how we make our saints like ourselves and our devils like our opposites."

House of Representatives

World Refugee Year

OF
HON. HERMAN TOLL OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 28, 1959

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8385) making appropriations for mutual security and related agencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the House included the item for the World Refugee Year in the mutual security appropriation bill.

Among the many supporters of this program is the American Jewish Committee. I believe the committee's statement, as adopted at its 52d annual meeting in New York on April 19, 1959, is worthy of the attention of every citizen and include it below:

STATEMENT ON WORLD REFUGEE YEAR BY THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE AT 52D ANNUAL MEETING, APRIL 17–19, 1959

By a resolution adopted on December 5, 1958, the General Assembly of the United Nations declared the year beginning July 1, 1959, as World Refugee Year. It laid down the following as the goals of the year: (a) To focus interest in the refugee problem and to encourage additional financial contributions from governments, voluntary agencies, and the general public for its solution; (b) to encourage additional opportunities for permanent refugee solutions, through resettlement or integration, on a humanitarian basis and in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the refugees themselves.

It asked the member states of the United Nations and the specialized agencies to cooperate, in accordance with the national wishes and needs of each country, in promoting a World Refugee Year as a practical means of securing increased assistance for refugees throughout the world.

In issuing the call for World Refugee Year, the General Assembly directed attention to the plight of all refugees throughout the world. It sought thereby to awaken the world's conscience to the need for urgent measures to solve or alleviate the problems of 30,000 in European camps, where some have spent a whole decade; 100,000 Europeans, likewise unsettled, though not in camps; a million Palestine Arab refugees; a million refugees from the Chinese mainland in Hong Kong; 60,000 or more Chinese in Macao; 170,000 Algerians in Tunisia and Morocco; 9,500 Europeans still trying to get out of Communist China; Jewish refugees from Egypt; Chinese refugees in Thailand and Laos; Tibetan refugees in India and Nepal; and displaced millions in India, Pakistan, Korea, and Vietnam.

The whole world is heartened that the United Nations has directed attention in this dramatic way to the sufferings and problems of the homeless victims of political and social dislocations and upheavals. We pledge our support toward realizing the aims of the Year, and urge that our Government and citizens organizations throughout the country do likewise.

We are pleased by the manifestation of support in the recent formation of the U.S. Committee for Refugees. That committee has called on our Government to appropriate additional funds and allocate surplus commodities for refugee aid programs, and on voluntary agencies to raise funds for their own refugee aid programs over and above their present budgets. It has also called upon our Government to admit annually 20,000 additional refuges outside existing quotas. Preliminary press reports indicate that the Government's program will be more modest than that urged.

These proposals exemplify the kind of measures governments and voluntary organizations can undertake for implementing the goals of the year. We welcome these proposals, limited though they are, but we hope that the Government and the public will make contributions that are more generous and more significant.

We feel that only if the nations introduce fundamental changes in their immigration policies will the refugee problem near solution. Therefore, we express our regret that our own Congress has failed up to now to embody in our law revisions along the lines urged by the President of the United States and by leading Members of Congress of both parties. These recommended revisions are based on the recognition that our present immigration laws reflect an attitude of distrust toward aliens, discriminate unjustly on grounds of the racial and national origins of aliens, and impose a self-defeating rigidity on efforts to promote our foreign policy and to perform effectively our role as leader of the free world.

We reaffirm our dedication to the goals of an enlightened and liberal immigration policy, and we hope that Congress will in the near future take such action as is necessary to bring this vital aspect of our policies into consonance with traditional American ideals. This would be the wisest and most dramatic contribution our country could make to the observance of the World Refugee Year.

SUBJECT: Engel v. Vitale, New York Public School Prayer Case

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: September 30, 1959

DIGEST: The New York Supreme Court, Nassau County, holds on August 24, 1959 that a local school board resolution, directing the daily recitation in the public schools of the Regents' suggested prayer, does not violate either the State or Federal Constitutions. The matter is remanded, however, to the Board to amend its resolution to make it explicit that students were free to participate or not, that their parents were to be advised of such choice and that the schools were forbidden to comment upon student participation or non-participation.

In 1951, the New York Board of Regents adopted a statement recommending that "At the commencement of each school day, the act of allegiance to the Flag might well be joined with... reverence to God" expressed in the form of the following prayer:

> Almighty God we acknowledge our dependence upon Thee, and we beg Thy blessings upon us, our parents, our teachers and our Country.

The Board of Education of Union Free School District No. 9, New Hyde Park, New York, accepted the Regents' recommendation and on July 8, 1958 adopted a resolution directing the school authorities under its jurisdiction to institute the daily recitation of the prayer following the salute to the flag. The practice was challenged by a group of taxpayers and parents of the children attending the public schools in the district.

On August 24, 1959, Mr. Justice Bernard S. Meyer, sitting at Special Term, Park I, Supreme Court, Nassau County, held that the local school Board's action did not violate either the State or the Federal Constitutions.

The Court first considers and rejects a number of procedural objections raised by the defendants such as that the petitioners had not exhausted their administrative remedies before appealing for judicial intervention, that the action was not commenced within the time prescribed by law, that the form of the action was not proper and finally that the petition did not contain the necessary allegation that the specific schools were under the jurisdiction and control of the defendant Board of Education. The Court holds that the petitioners have standing to challenge the Board's resolution under "both New York and Federal law" and that the issue presented is the power of the local Board to adopt the resolution requiring daily prayer, unsupported by any administrative, legislative or constitutional requirement that it provide spiritual training for the children attending the public schools under its jurisdiction.

At the outset of the analysis of the legal issues the Court acknowledges that the question is "close." The Court rejects as "of no weight" the defendant's thesis that the "present rate of juvenile delinquency evidences the need for prayer in the schools." Similarly, the opinion rejects the argument "that the appointment of chaplains by the Congress in 1791 represents a practical construction by the Congress responsible for the First Amendment of its meaning" since no citizen-taxpayer has standing to challenge appropriation acts of Congress in the courts. The opinion also rejects the spectre of "Godless" schools raised by the defendants "if the prayer herein involved is not sanctioned."

Mr. Justice Meyer accepts the "religious nature of prayer" and points out that the use of prayer cannot be justified because "this is a religious nation" or because the prayer is to be said "in conjunction with the pledge of allegiance." There are other, equally effective, constitutionally uninhibited means of familiarizing students with our religious heritage. On the other hand, if the purpose is to inculcate in pupils a love of God, then the prayer would constitute religious instruction in violation of the "establishment" clause of the Federal Constitution.

A difficult issue is presented, however, when the prayer is considered an "integral part of our natural heritage." The Court argues that the "establishment" clause of the First Amendment was never intended to outlaw the practice of prayer or Bible reading in the schools any more than it was intended to outlaw them from the rest of public life. Turning to a consideration of "the history of the times" to determine whether the concept of separation extended to the exclusion of prayer and Bible reading as school routines when the First and Fourteenth Amendments were adopted, the Court concludes that "neither the sense of the nation, the debates, nor the individual views of the framers proscribe prayer as the ceremonial opening of a school day." The Court next takes up the relevant court decisions.

Meyer v. Nebraska (invalidating a state statute that prohibited the teaching of foreign languages below the eighth grade) and Pierce v. Society of Sisters (invalidating a state statute requiring all children to attend public schools), are cited for the proposition that the parent has primary control over the education of the child but that that control is subject to the exercise of the state's police power in appropriate cases -- "where there is a substantial nexus between the action required and the end sought to be obtained."

A whole series of U.S. Supreme Court and State Supreme Court cases dealing with the free exercise of religion are next described -- civil recognition of the decisions of church authorities on matters of church law and discipline, Watson v. Jones; the supremacy of the police power to forbid polygamy despite religious conviction, Reynolds v. U.S.; the flag saluting case, West Virginia v. Barnette; use of public streets and parks to win adherents, Cantwell v. Connecticut, Fowler v. Rhode Island; the right of the state to insist upon compulsory education to age 16 despite objection on religious grounds, Commonwealth v. Beiler; etc. The most important decisions interpreting the "establishment" clause -- Everson, McCollum and Zorach -- are next summarized.

The opinion argues that Zorach was "a retreat from both Everson and McCollum...Zorach recognized that the Government can, without violation [of the establishment clause], accommodate all religions."

> The democratic nature of our Government precludes the imposition of sanctions in the field of religion; the religious nature of the governed sanctions the inclusion of religion in the processes of democratic life; the dividing line between permitted accommodation and proscribed compulsion is a matter of degree, to be determined anew in each new fact situation.

The Court points out that none of the Federal cases dealt directly with prayer or Bible reading in the public schools, and turns to a consideration of the state court decisions. "Prayer in the schools, either separately or together with the Bible has been upheld in ten and struck down in seven state decisions. Of the cases concerned solely with the reading of the Bible, nine have upheld and two have struck down Bible reading as a devotional exercise." Many of these cases turned on whether the Court regarded the Bible or the Lord's Prayer as sectarian. Also, many of the courts upholding these practices have pointed to the non-compulsory features of the exercise.

"Some form of prayer," the Court says, "would appear to fall within the realm of permissible accommodation" mentioned in the Zorach decision. The instant prayer -- "twenty-two words in length" -- is "devotional" and when its recitation is limited to daily exercises at the opening of school, the Court believes it should be classified as "outside McCollum's proscription of religious instruction and within Zorach's sanction as an accommodation."

Since, however, the Board's resolution is framed in mandatory terms, the Court remands the matter to the Board to modify the resolution:

> To establish a procedure whereby the parents of each child are advised of the adoption of the resolution calling for the saying of prayer, of the wording of the prayer and of the procedure to be followed when it is said and requested to indicate whether the child shall or shall not participate in the exercise.

The opinion next takes up the petitioners' argument that "subtle pressures" result from the school's apparent sanction of the prayer and considers such pressures as characteristic of the conflict between all dissenters and society. The Court refuses to raise "psychological dissent...to the level of government force" and thereby subordinate "the spiritual needs of believers to the psychological needs of non-believers."

Since the case was being remanded for revision of the Board's resolution, the Court also considers and rejects the petitioners' argument that the proposed prayer was sectarian and hence prohibited in the public schools under the New York State Constitution.

> The fact that the prayer and the manner of its saying may not conform to all of the tenets of the Jewish, Unitarian and Ethical Culture groups, or of any other group, does not mean that the prayer is sectarian. Nor can it be said in any true sense that the granting of legislative permission to say a prayer as an opening exercise in a school is a preference of believers over non-believers when the saying of the prayer is not made compulsory. To put it shortly, since each is free to follow his own predeliction with respect to prayer, to participate in a prayer exercise or to refuse to do so, the exercise cannot be deemed preferential.

Open Occupancy For American Cities

By Donald S. Frey of the Evanston, Illinois, Bar; Member, Section of Municipal Law

In a world in ferment and revolution, people in many metropolitan areas in America are becoming increasingly concerned over prevailing housing practices that risk America's being "pointed at as a nation of hypocrites."[1] American communities have permitted real estate agents to rent or sell to people, and bankers to finance such sales, on the basis of such people's nationality, color or religion. These practices are in large measure condoned in the belief that diversification of people in an area impairs property values and is socially undesirable.[2]

But recently a revulsion against these practices is becoming apparent, with church and civic groups pointing to minority individuals being crowded into small areas and receiving a disproportionate share of the annual new housing erected.[3] Studies have exploded "myths" that earlier supported these discriminatory practices, such as the idea that minority people could not maintain their property. The traditional fair-play attitude of Americans is challenging the whole concept of housing segregation.

A real sense of urgency is emerging in the face of segregation barriers in most cities which are actually higher today than they were fifteen years ago. Furthermore, housing desegregation is now seen necessary if school integration and other human relations goals are to be won.

What Is An Open Occupancy Ordinance?

People in various cities are, therefore, proposing "open occupancy laws," under which no owner or landlord can refuse to sell or to lease to another person, because of that person's nationality, color or religion.[4] Such laws provide a definite formal campaign against these housing practices, rather than those existing in so many areas which are vague, uncoordinated, or negative. New York City and Pittsburgh have passed such "open occupancy ordinances,"[5] and their ordinances are considered to be the long-awaited breakthrough against this most pernicious form of discrimination outside the South. The interest is accelerating at such a rapid rate that "open occupancy laws" may someday equal the fair employment legislation which exists today in nineteen states and forty cities.[6]

Owners of private property are discovering that their private interest is best served by adhering to the higher ethic of the public interest. An "open occupancy law" is in effect a simple declaration that housing is a matter of prime public interest, and, therefore, ought to conform to that public policy pervading our entire fabric of laws which requires that each of us be treated on our merits and not denied access to needed facilities because of ancient group labels or prejudices.

Courts and Legislative Action for Fair Housing

Certain court opinions have assisted groups in metropolitan areas to fight unfair housing proctices. For example, the Supreme Court of the United States held in 1917 that racial zoning laws and ordinances were invalid.[7] In 1948, the Supreme Court refused judicial enforcement of race restrictive covenants.[8] In 1954, the Court refused to review a California decision that the practice of racial segregation in public housing was prohibited.[9] Most of these decisions rested upon the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Concerned peoples in America's metropolitan areas have been assisted recently by state legislation on fair housing. To date, nine states have banned discrimination in public or publicly-assisted housing, defining "publicly-assisted" in various ways, but including in some instances housing built with loans secured by government guaranties. But up to 1959 no state had applied its ban completely to private housing, which, of course, represents the bulk of housing in all areas. In some states, the ban on "publicly-assisted housing" applies only to future housing, which again means that a large bulk of existing housing is exempt from the ban. During the year 1959 four states enacted for the first time "open occupancy" legislation applying to private housing (Colorado, Massachuetts, Oregon, and Connecticut).[10]

Human Relations Commissions

Unfair housing practices are being fought by an increasing number of voluntary citizens' groups working for racial dispersion throughout their entire communities. These volunteer groups are aided by the growth of Human Relations Commissions. To date, there are ninteen state commissions established by statute, and thirty-eight municipal commissions established by ordinance.[11]

Early experience indicates that many state legislatures may find it difficult to determine that the unfair housing practices in one or more metropolitan areas in such state are of such a nature as to threaten the peace or hamper the public welfare of the entire state, while on the other hand the legislative backer in the municipalities comprising the metropolitan areas themselves may well come to the contrary conclusion and move to enact "open occupancy" ordinances resting upon the police powers of the municipalities.

That cities are not waiting for states to take action in this serious problem can be seen from the example in Illinois. Already, for at least fourteen years, citizens of various Illinois cities and villages have been serving as members of Human Relations Commissions, established by ordinances. (There are other "semi-official" bodies existing in other municipalities such as "Councils" established by a "resolution" of the Aldermen or Trustees, or "Mayors' Commissions" appointed solely at the initiative of the Mayor.)

A study of these ordinances[12] indicates: (a) the number of such commissions is accelerating in recent years; (b) the commission members serve without compensation, although the clerical expenses of the commissions appear to be part of the municipal budgets; (c) the members of the commissions are broadly representative of the population of the community; (d) the number of commissioners ranges from five to fifteen.

The stated justification for most such ordinances is to preserve the "peace" and protect the "public welfare." (Ordinance 3244, East St. Louis.) However, one ordinance plainly recites that it is "in support of constitutional provisions against prejudice and practice of discrimination against any individual or group because of race, color, creed, national origin, or ancestry." (Ordinance 4165, Joliet.) Several of these ordinances carry a specific declaration of policy—which declaration in effect puts the corporate authorities on record as opposed to discriminatory practices.

The functions of these officially established commissions may be classified as follows: (a) to report to city officials; (b) to investigate complaints and initiate their own investigations; (c) to conduct public hearings; (d) to provide for mediation through conference and conciliation; (e) to investigate employment opportunities; (f) to recommend legislative action deemed appropriate. The general stated aims for these commissions are: (a) to further understanding between people; (b) to promote the American ideal of equality and justice; (c) to study nature and cause of prejudice; (d) to encourage wise adjustment to social problems; (e) to cooperate with other organizations to promote tolerance (community groups and state and federal agencies); (f) to promote interfaith and interracial harmony.

But even the growth and work of these Human Relations Commissions, plus the state legislation limited to publicly-assisted housing plus the court decisions, all together, have not provided sufficient impact nor aid to stem the tide toward greater housing segregation in American cities.[13] It appears evident that open occupancy ordinances, resting on the police power of the municipality, are necessary to achieve democracy in housing, and many other human relations goals as well.

How Does An Open Occupancy Ordinance Work?

One year's experience has accumulated under New York City's Open Occupancy Ordinance.[14] Of two hundred fifty complaints filed, all but two were settled by the Commission, which appears scrupulous to stress education and mediation. Pre-enactment fears that the ordinance would prove disruptive and increase hostility between landlords and tenants have proved to be wrong. Also, fears that the ordinance would cause mortgage lenders to refuse loans to owners of apartment houses that were integrated have proved wrong.

Under this New York City Ordinance, a complaint is first filed with the Commission. If the complaint cites a practice found upon investigation to be discriminatory and in violation of the ordinance, then the Commission is directed to "conciliate and eliminate" the practice. Failing this, the matter is referred to a Fair Housing Practice Panel for a hearing. If court action is found warranted after the hearing, the case is referred to the Corporation Counsel for equitable proceedings.

Under the Pittsburgh ordinance, the complaint is filed with the Commission, which, if it finds an unlawful housing practice, seeks to eliminate it by "conciliation and persuasion." Should these measures fail, the Commission itself holds a public hearing, and may later decide to "certify the case and the entire record of the proceedings to the City Solicitor for appropriate action to secure enforcement of the Commission's order."

Both ordinances exempt housing controlled by religious organizations.

In the New York City ordinance, the only exceptions as to sale of private housing (as distinguished from housing given government aid) are one and two-family houses built in developments of not more than ten dwellings. In the Pittsburgh ordinance, the exception is lowered to not more than four dwellings under the control of one owner. The Pittsburgh ordinance goes further than the New York City ordinance in specifically declaring it an "unlawful housing practice" for real estate brokers, lending institutions, and other persons (in addition to sellers) to discriminate "because of race, color, religion, ancestry, or national origin" in connection with the sale or rental of housing."

An open occupancy ordinance declares it the public policy of the city to help create integrated neighborhoods and thus welcome residents into the community irrespective of race, religion, or national origin. An ordinance sets up some investigatory and conciliation machinery, either within an existing Human Relations Commission as in Pittsburgh, or it establishes one, as in New York, with power to investigate and negotiate in these areas of discrimination. Beyond this declaration of public policy and beyond the investigative and conciliation machinery, the open occupancy laws in operation or under contemplation contain enforcement machinery for operation against recalcitrant sellers, renters, or real estate firms. Judicial action may take the form of a cease and desist order from a municipal court judge, if the case is not dismissed through negotiation. The extreme sanction—contempt of court—has rarely been used, at least in the field of employment discrimination, but it is a deterrent which is always in the background for use in an extremity. Probably any law passed would emphasize policy more than punishment, but if we believe in a government of laws—whether on the local, national, or international level—we must believe in enforcement powers and not just pious pleas. Again The Commission on Race stated that "the great majority of discriminatory complaints have been settled by informal methods of investigation and conference . . . Nevertheless, the existence of legal sanctions in the background is considered essential . . . Commissions, to be effective, must have authority and sanctions at their disposal, even if they use them sparingly."

Neither ordinance expressly prohibits discriminatory advertising relating to housing. However, the Pittsburgh provision on "any person . . . to aid, incite . . . participate in the doing of any act declared to be an unlawful housing practice" may be held to prohibit the publication of such future advertising. New York City has another ordinance specifically condemning such discriminatory advertising practices.[15]

Is Fair Housing Legislation A Municipal Function?

It must be recognized, of course, that with respect to political subdivisions any proposed legislation must also be within the framework of the powers which the municipality may exercise under the law. While there are usually no express provisions in the state constitution or "city charter acts" for the enactment of a fair housing practices ordinance, a municipality does usually have broad general powers to enact ordinances which promote the good government and welfare of the community.[16]

Indeed, the same considerations which prompted enactment of the fair employment practices ordinances in various municipalities would support the power of these cities to adopt a fair housing practices ordinance. But most states have statutes granting specific and general powers to their municipalities sufficient to justify the enactment of Open Occupancy Ordinances. For example, Illinois has a Revised Cities and Villages Act which embraces all the powers granted by the Illinois State Legislature to the municipalities within the state. A number of these powers which relate to our inquiry in this paper are identified below.[17]

As is the case with most states, the long line of Illinois court opinions noted (in footnote 17) make it clear that an Illinois municipality, in view of the specific powers set forth in the state statutes, would be authorized to pass an open occupancy ordinance if the municipal council believed such ordinance to contribute to the health, welfare, and safety of the community. Municipalities are held to possess powers "necessarily incident to powers expressly granted." Ordinances relating to "the most important police power" of caring for the safety and health of a community are to be liberally construed. Private rights are subject to the exercise of this police power, as well as the right of liberty of property of an individual. (Inconvenience or loss to the individual may result.) The power to make regulations necessary or expedient for the promotion of the health of a community is said to be "inherent in a municipality and may be exercised whether expressly granted or not." It is said that anything harmful to a community may be prohibited under a city's police power.

Little litigation has developed questioning municipal power to regulate individual liberties. Municipal authority to segregate in public housing was upheld in various jurisdictions when the "separate but equal" doctrine was accepted. In the circuit court opinion in John R. Thompson Co. v. District of Columbia,[18] the majority suggested, in dictum, that the question of the power of cities to segregate is distinguishable from the question of the power of cities to enforce nondiscrimination. The distinction was said to rest on the fact that segregation laws were in accord with custom and usage, and, therefore, were valid in that they served the purpose of preserving the peace.

The reasoning pertaining to restaurants might well seem equally applicable to housing legislation, for it, too, has aspects which commend it to local treatment. Since population distribution of minority groups, their housing conditions in general, and the attitudes of the state population may be expected to vary from locality to locality, the city is perhaps best able to weigh the advantages and disadvantages that might be expected to flow from fair housing regulation. Municipal concern with the effective distribution of available housing is not unlike the considerations which give rise to city zoning powers. When conditions which bear on an area of potential government control are found to vary within a state, the very rationales which support the existence of home rule seem to argue for its regulation by the municipality. Also, there is now a growing weight of evidence that integrated housing can work to the peace and prosperity of a community.[19]

How Is The Need For Fair Housing Legislation Established?

How are community groups and their lawyers developing the evidence to present to municipal legislatures to sustain finding that open occupancy ordinances are needed to promote the health, safety and welfare of the community? The first step is to develop community wide "inventories of human relations problems," enlisting the services of volunteer civic groups under the guidance of a professional sociologist and other experts in the human relations field. Data is gathered and marshaled to support later the findings in the opening paragraphs of the ordinance, highlighting the serious impact of housing discrimination upon the municipalities, the creation of substandard dwellings, and overcrowded areas, unsanitary living conditions, the breeding places for crime and delinquency, the intergroup tensions, and other harmful results. Data is collected on the evidence of "rejection" inspired by living in separation from the rest of the community. If the municipal authorities consider that outlawing discrimination in housing will tend to ameliorate these conditions, and thus promote the peace, good government, and welfare of the municipality, the legislation appears to be within the powers granted to the municipality by law.

In the case of a municipality having practically no minority individuals living presently within its borders but which is located within a metropolitan area suffering from intergroup tensions and from overcrowding of minority people in segregated districts within the whole area, the said municipality may properly decide that this general metropolitan condition is a threat to the "peace" and "welfare" of its community.

Is There An Infringement of Private Rights?

To the argument raised by antagonistic groups that "open occupancy" ordinances unfairly limit the right of an individual to use his private property as he chooses, it should be pointed out that such ordinances as are on the books and being proposed do not intrude on the owner's legitimate right to require satisfactory credit ratings of any prospective tenant or buyer or to make certain that the applicant meets every reasonable objective test of general desirability as a tenant or buyer. The ordinance does not deprive the seller or lessor of the opportunity to transact his business. It merely requires that he sell or rent at any price satisfactory to him, but without regard to race, color, or creed of the offeree. The fact that a potential purchaser or lessee is of a particular minority group would seem to be a factor wholly irrelevant to legitimate commercial purposes, and obligatory disregard of it is not an overly severe infringement on the liberty to contract.

In our democracy, an individual's rights are severely limited for the public safety and welfare in many ways. If traffic can be controlled to save lives, why not housing discrimination? Ordinarily we Americans do not choose our neighbors. As the Commission on Race states, "A person seeking a place to live chooses a neighborhood, but other residents of the area do not normally choose him . . . In a typical (neighborhood) situation, such a right can neither be affirmed nor denied; it is merely irrelevant."[20] The real individual rights violated today are those of Negroes and other minorities who live in a society where segregation has been all but compulsory.

Private property rights have always been limited by broad public interest. A basic tenet of our legal system is that for every right there is a duty—and in this instance, the operation of specific types of private property must meet certain publicly determined standards. Precedent for equal access to shelter dates back to the Middle Ages with respect to innkeepers under Anglo-Saxon law.

What Are These Unfair Housing Practices?

Antagonistic groups argue that there really is no problem, and that previous court decisions under the Fourteenth and Fifth Amendments to the Federal Constitution should already offer sufficient protection to minority individuals seeking to find homes. The short answer is that the need is for legal protection against private action. Existing private housing practices that invite attention here include the following:

a. Minorities are refused to be shown rental housing in "restricted areas;"

b. Minorities are prevented from openly shopping themselves for homes in "restricted areas;"

c. Discriminatory advertisements underscore public acceptance of segregated housing;

d. The bulk of rental housing and sale housing in metropolitan areas is handled efficiently by boards of real estate brokers agreeing to unwritten code not to sell properties in "restricted areas" to minorities;

e. Financing for housing for minorities in "restricted areas" is withheld;

f. Pricing for housing for minorities in "restricted areas" disproportionately high;

g. Developers of new housing sections refuse to offer homes to minorities;

h. Actual misrepresentations of true attitude of neighborhood about minorities circulated by agents and other persons;

i. Zoning ordinance amendments designed indirectly to freeze existing patterns of segregation or to force minorities from particular municipality.

It is submitted that the very existence of an open occupancy ordinance discourages such practices. The Supreme Court decisions denying judicial enforceability to restrictive covenants simply caused real estate agents to go underground. Neighborhood groups were formed to (a) make the new family feel it was not wanted; (b) bring pressure on the seller to refuse to sell; (c) conspire with banks not to make loans. Neighbors are scared into signing petitions and joining in the antagonistic activities of such groups by arguments that property values will suffer.

What Can Federal and State Governments Do?

Now, while the FHA no longer participates in the above practices, the builders, lenders, and real estate men contrive to do so in open contradiction of the principles of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and the court decisions. The question should perhaps be asked of the courts whether, where private institutions control the access of minorities to a government agency, should not they be subject to the same requirement as is a government agency—not to deny any member of a minority group equal rights (Fourteenth Amendment) and not to withdraw the privileges of citizenship from any person without due process of law (Fifth Amendment)? A reexamination of this whole field of law would seem to be in order in the face of our changing times and practices and the increasing public conscience.

It has been assumed that since the powers of the U. S. Congress are limited to those specifically delegated to it by the Constitution, Congress does not have authority to forbid discrimination in the sale of ordinary private housing. On the other hand, it has been recognized that since a state may take any action not expressly forbidden by a provision of the Federal Constitution or the Constitution of the state, the state as a civil rights matter under its police power might prohibit racial and religious discrimination and segregation in any housing, public, publicly-assisted, or private.[21]

State statutes similar to the Federal Civil Rights Law could be enacted declaring the right to own, lease, or occupy property without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin as a civil right. While such law would have no immediate effect, it would serve to establish a statutory policy of opposition to the type of discriminatory practices in housing set forth above. It might even be argued that the absence of such action by the state in the light of existing unfair practices was state action in reverse, actually failing to protect the equal rights of minority individuals and thus falling within the condemnation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Can We Discriminate With Private Housing?

The individual owner of a house or apartment building has felt generally free to discriminate in selling or leasing. Nevertheless, when government and private individuals combine in the production of housing facilities, the question of whether the accommodations may be disposed of on a discriminatory basis is not settled. The Fourteenth and Fifth Amendments, by their terms, direct their commandments to the states and Congress alone, while jointly-produced property is generally in the hands of private individuals by the time of lease or sale. But the concept of "state action" has been significantly expanded to apply the Constitution's proscriptions to the conduct of private persons, who, because of their powerful community position or because of the relationship of themselves or their activities to the government, "can be fairly said"[22] to be acting for or as the state.

With particular significance to the housing question, it has been said that persons who have been aided by the power of the state to perform an activity cannot use methods prohibited to the government itself. In Shelley v. Kraemer[23] where the Supreme Court declared that restrictive covenants entered into by private persons were unenforceable, the Court noted that in Buchanan v. Warley[24] the Court had held that the states might not indirectly achieve that end through the medium of a zoning ordinance.

This attitude against indirection by the state in participating in discrimination was more fully expressed in a concurring opinion in the case of Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R. R.[25] The issue presented to the Court was whether a union, statutorily recognized as the bargaining agent of a group of employees by the Railroad Labor Act, might validly bargain with the employer for a hiring and promotion program designed to eliminate Negroes from the working force. A majority of the Court held the provisions of the collective bargaining agreement invalid, basing its decision on an interpretation of the Railway Labor Act as requiring the recognized union to represent all employees in its unit fairly and equally and to refrain from bargaining for provisions which served only discriminatory purposes. Justice Murphy, concurring, found the case to be governed, not merely by the statute involved, but also by the principle that the union, having gained its power and position by force of the federal government, was constitutionally constrained to conduct itself as the Government must.[26] Subsequently, a majority of the Court in American Communications Ass'n. v. Douds[27] alluding to the Steele decision, stated: "But power is never without responsibility. And when authority derives in part from the Government's thumb on the scales, the exercise of that power by private persons becomes closely akin, in some respects, to its exercise by Government itself."

There may well be limits to the freedom of an individual to discriminatorily sell or lease property acquired without any form of governmental assistance whatsoever. Private owners of housing developments and large apartment projects might be constrained by law, from disposing of their accommodations on a nondiscriminatory basis. The Supreme Court, in Marsh v. Alabama[28] suggested that a private person who has gained a position of significant societal power and is performing the functions usually performed by the government itself is subject to the proscriptions of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Preventing Real Estate Agents From Unfair Practices

We have noted that the Pittsburgh Open Occupancy Ordinance specifically brings the real estate agent under control. An analysis of some of the state statutes on unfair housing practices is interesting in this respect. For example, a New Jersey statute regulates all real estate owners regardless of the non-commercial nature of the holdings and only indirect government assistance is necessary.[29] A Connecticut statute[30] does not predicate its application upon any specific form of government assistance, providing that "all persons within the jurisdiction of this state shall be entitled to full and equal accommodations in every place of public accommodation . . ." A "place of public accommodation" is defined as "any establishment, including, but not limited to, public housing projects and all other forms of publicly assisted housing, which caters or offers its services or facilities or goods to the general public." The Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights has ruled that even a real estate agent who operates an establishment which offers its services to the general public is subject to the statute.[31] Were this interpretation to be accepted by the courts, it would seem that apartment house owners and project developers are also within the purview of the enactment.

Most, if not all, states license real estate brokers and salesmen. There are strict requirements for such licenses and they may be forfeited if the broker or salesman commits a serious violation. A state could properly include among these requirements a provision that brokers may not refuse to sell or lease property to any persons for reasons of race, religion or national origin. In the absence of such state legislation, there would seem to be no reason why a municipality could not do the same in the exercise of its police power.

Banks And Unfair Housing Practices

The Pittsburgh open occupancy ordinance also singles out lending institutions for control. Willingness of the housing supplier is often not sufficient alone to enable minority group members to acquire private housing. Financial assistance for a purchase in a "restricted area" may also be discriminately withheld. New Jersey, by amendment of its Savings and Loan Act and its Banking Act,[32] has expressly provided that the granting of mortgage loans shall be without regard to race, creed, color, national ancestry, or origin, nor shall there be discrimination as to the terms of such loans.

Zoning Ordinances and Open Occupancy

In the light of existing housing practices, it is submitted that certain zoning ordinances in American cities today might be challenged as in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where an open occupancy ordinance is not enacted by the said municipality. For example, a zoning ordinance amendment shown to be in accord with a known discriminatory policy of depriving minority people of multiple housing is in effect "zoning racially" —and thus government aid is being used discriminatorily —lending this government aid to enforced, unwritten, but nevertheless understood, race restrictive covenants— empowering private persons to do what the government itself cannot do—use the criterion of race.

As communities throughout the nation are planning and initiating redevelopment projects to replace slum areas, it is particularly important that the public be alerted to the danger of freezing segregated housing patterns for years to come. While urban redevelopment is properly heralded by housing experts as the key to the future development of American cities, it also presents a potentially grave problem for the future of intergroup relations in this country. Properly planned and administered, the urban redevelopment provisions of the Federal Housing Act of 1949 could aid materially in realizing the stated objective of the law to provide "a decent home and suitable living environment for every American Family." Improperly implemented, however, these provisions can permanently impose a pattern of segregated living in the United States.

In the last few years, the courts of this country have handed municipalities enormously increased authority to procceed with planning and zoning. This had gone hand-in-hand with startling new planning techniques. This new authority and this new power mean an increased control and regulation over private property. This control is vested—in its entirety—in each of a thousand local bodies. If we are to concede to government these additional powers in the name of better living, surely they must be accompanied by standards which will permit the exercise of those powers, fairly, decently, and without prejudice.

The Police Power of State and Municipality

The zoning power of a municipality is rooted in the police power of the state. This police power, the least limitable of state powers, extends to the enactment of all legislation that is reasonably necessary for the public health, safety, morals and general welfare. The trend of Supreme Court decisions has been to extend the definition of "general welfare" so that today there is hardly a public need of any sort which may not serve to justify state legislative action, or municipal action.

An open occupancy ordinance may be said to have a double-edged purpose: (a) to open up a new, and needed, market for homes to members of minority groups who are able to afford them, and (b) to wage a frontal attack against slum areas that are caused in part by the inability of great numbers of persons to purchase or rent elsewhere. Both these purposes are justified by the police power.

Open occupancy ordinances may be attacked with the question of whether a state or municipality may limit the scope of its enactment to a particular group of property owners. Ironically, the two problems in this area which are presented by the state laws are (a) the differentiation in treatment which the ordinances accord "commercial" property owners and individual home owners, and (b) the differentiation between those who receive government aid and those who do not. The doctrinal approach of the courts is that a particular classification is not violative of the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment so long as the characteristics of the classes are such that the variations in treatment have some relation to the desired ends of the law.[33] The question of justified classifications is not as important when the police power approach is used to support fair housing laws as when the civil rights approach is used.

Restricting operation of an anti-discrimination law to owners of multiple dwellings and project developers appears to meet this minimal standard. While it may not be supposed that such persons discriminate to any greater degree than uncontrolled property owners, the states might nonetheless reaonably consider the need for regulation of this class to be greater.

When presented with this classification quetion in State Comm'n Against Discrimination v. Pelham Hall Apartments, the New York Supreme Court justified the classification on the basis of the "step-at-a-time" rule formulated by the United States Supreme Court in Williamson v. Lee Optical Co.[34] This doctrine recognizes the right of a state to carve out of a group of persons, similarly situated, a class whose activities or numbers are such as to create a greater need for immediate regulation than the balance of the group. "(R)eform may take one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind."

"Controlled Occupancy" or "Quotas"

To meet the fallacious argument that "open occupancy" might bring floods of minority people into formerly "restricted neighborhoods," some people have suggested a quota plan for each neighborhood roughly in accord with the population proportions. It is submitted that a quota plan is not necessary if the governmental units in an entire metropolitan area should adopt open occupancy ordinances at about the same time and honestly enforce them. Furthermore, it is doubtful whether any quota plan could be enforced or even administered in a practical manner. Finally, the legality of a quota plan for private housing would be most doubtful, as the use of a quota has not even been sustained in public housing.[35] Actually, enforced quotas have been practiced on a voluntary basis in the private housing field as evidenced by increasing incidence of successfully planned interracial developments.[36]

Conclusion

To conclude our analysis of "Open Occupancy Ordinances," we all realize that prejudice and discrimination are two different things. Prejudice is a preconceived opinion, usually thought to be unreasonable, existing only in the mind, while discrimination is an overt act of treating someone favorably or unfavorably as compared with others, whether or not as a result of prejudice. The idea that prejudice causes all discrimination is too simple, for many persons conform to discriminatory patterns of behavior not because they are prejudiced but because they lack the strength to resist the group's demand for conformity. Discrimination, in some situations, is the easiest way out. Official declarations for fair practices help these people take the right step.[37]

Even the prejudiced person does not always take the next step and discriminate. Opinions do not flower automatically into behavior. Whether or not the prejudiced person acts in accordance with his beliefs depends on many circumstances, not the least of these is his community's expression of what is right and proper, such as can be embodied in an open occupancy ordinance.

The expression by ordinances and statutes of what is considered right and proper conduct is a practice that has existed in this country since its beginning. The Constitution, the Bill of Rights, the Sherman Act and the Sunday "blue" laws all embody our ideas of what is right. Anti-bias legislation, as an attempt to lead the community toward a practical application of our basic ideals, has had a similar history. In the field of employment bias, city and state laws have appreciably lessened discriminatory employment practices in less than a decade.

Law is never the total answer to changing human habit patterns. Law should, however, not be considered an alternative to education, but as a complementary method to achieve greater equality. We believe in accident prevention education, but we also have traffic laws to prevent reckless driving. We believe in discrimination prevention education, but we should not be afraid to enact anti-discrimination laws to prevent reckless human relations patterns. As will the courts in sustaining later legislation, the councilmen, aldermen, or trustees of all municipal bodies will be impressed with factual data showing that both the majority and the minority suffer from these unfair housing practices, and that the police powers of the corporate public entity should be exercised—as well as the Fourteenth Amendment and the Federal Constitution extended to its realistic limit—to prohibit these practices with their resultant overcrowding, crime-breeding slums, cancroid ghettos, destructive resentments and indignities, and failures in human understanding and communication. Then, like the psalmist of old,[38]

"That glory may dwell in our land.
Mercy and truth are met together:
Righteousness and peace have kissed each other."

SUBJECT: Operation of Public School Athletic Activities on Discriminatory Basis

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: November 8, 1959

DIGEST: Attorney General of California rules that a public school may not legally have a swimming team whose only facilities for practice are at a privately owned swimming pool which refuses admittance to members of the Negro race thus preventing Negroes from trying to become members of the school swimming team.

On September 17, 1959 Attorney General Stanley Mosk of California responded to a request for an opinion from the Honorable S. C. Masterson, Assemblyman of the 11th Assembly District of California on the legality of a public school having a swimming team whose only facilities for practice are at a privately owned swimming pool where admittance is refused to members of the Negro race.

The request for the Attorney General's opinion arose from the following factual situation. A public high school in California has a swimming team but not a swimming pool. The members of the team practice in the pool of a privately owned men's residence and social club, the rules of which provide that only members may use the pool. Students of the public high school signing up for the team are required to obtain membership in the club which permits white students to become junior members but refuses to grant membership to Negroes. The result is to deny to Negroes the opportunity to participate in the school's swimming program.

The question put by the Assemblyman to the Attorney General is whether the public school may constitutionally maintain an organized swimming program on the basis described above.

The opinion of the Attorney General referred to the Supreme Court decisions in the case of Brown vs. Board of Education, Bolling vs. Sharpe and Cooper vs. Aaron which held racial segregation in the public schools unconstitutional. He noted that the Brown case represents the final step to date in the evolution of the rights of colored students and that the principle announced by the Court in that case must therefore be applied in determining whether any specific act of racial discrimination in the public schools is prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. Applying this principle the Attorney General concluded that the swimming team arrangement in question effectively bars Negro students from access to a particular school-sponsored, school-supported athletic activity. He noted, "Whatever motivation explains the action, the net result is discrimination against Negro students on account of their race," and concluded that the swimming team arrangement was illegal and a violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

SUBJECT: Perry v. School District No. 81, Spokane, Washington - Released Time

DATE: November 12, 1959

DIGEST: On October 8th, 1959 the Supreme Court of the State of Washington unanimously ruled that a released time program in operation in Spokane did not violate the provisions of the State or Federal Constitution requiring separation of church and state. It did, however, rule that certain practices in the Spokane, Washington released time program were improper, the distribution of consent cards for participation in the program to children in the public school classrooms and the making of announcements as to the existence of the program by representatives of religious groups or school instructors in the classrooms or on school premises.

On October 8th, 1959 the Supreme Court of the State of Washington ruled that the released time program carried on in the public schools of Spokane, Washington was constitutional. The program in question had been in operation since 1938. A group of Protestant denominations and one parish of the Roman Catholic Church participated.

The consent cards requesting student participation in the released time religious classes were made available to the principal of each school by representatives of religious groups early in the school year. The cards were then distributed to students either by representatives of the religious groups or by the individual teachers, depending upon the preference of the school principal involved. The children were told of the availability of religious instruction and directed to take the cards home to their parents. At the time set for religious instruction, those children whose parents had signed the request cards and caused them to be returned were released from their regular classroom activities. They were met at the school by an escort provided by the religious group and taken to the religious instruction classroom off the school premises. At the end of the religious instruction, the children were returned to their public school classrooms by the escort from the religious group.

The children whose parents had not requested their release remained in the classroom and continued public school activities. In most instances, where only a few children remained, the regular group instruction ceased and the children were kept occupied with special projects, additional individual help or some other school activity depending upon the discretion of the classroom teacher.

The school district exercised no control over the religious instructors or the material they used. There was no report by the released time instructors to the school as to attendance or the child's performance in the released time classes. As the Court sums it up, the function of the school district is to facilitate the distribution of the request cards and thereafter to note which children are to be released.

The foregoing record was established by the pleadings, depositions and admissions. There was no actual testimony taken at the trial.

The lower court ruled that the released time program in question was constitutional and the plaintiffs appealed. The Washington Supreme Court speaking through Judge Munter noted that released time in public schools is a question not passed upon in the State of Washington. The Court then discussed other decisions in the federal courts and in other state courts dealing with the same general problem. It concluded that the released time program in itself has never been held to be in contravention of the doctrine of separation of church and state and that it is only the manner in which it has been practiced that may have constituted a violation. It noted that each case is determined by its own facts.

The Court reviewed the decisions in the McCollum case and in the Zorach case pointing out that the arguments of those attacking released time in the Zorach case are similar to those advanced against the program in the case under consideration.

The Court concluded that the significant difference in the facts of the Zorach case and the instant case was that in the instant case the school board permitted the distribution of consent cards and the making of announcements by representatives of religious groups or teachers relative to the program in the classrooms or on school premises. The Court pointed out that this practice was present in the McCollum case but was absent in the Zorach case. This practice, the Court stated, "has the further effect of influencing the pupils, while assembled in the classrooms, as a 'captive audience' to participate in a religious program, contrary to the express provisions of Article IX, Section 4 of our state constitution: 'All schools maintained or supported wholly or in part by the public funds shall be forever free from sectarian control or influence' (Italics ours)."

The Court specifically rejected the argument that the released time program disrupts the instruction of the children remaining in the classroom to their detriment and that the compulsory school attendance laws are violated by the released time program. The Court noted that children remaining in school are assigned to special projects and receive the advantage of individual instruction during the released time periods and that the children released are allowed to go upon their parents' request. Such release of the children, the Court found, constitutes an exercise by the superintendent of schools of the statutory discretion vested in him to excuse pupils "for any other sufficient reason".

The Court went on to note that it was "never the intention that our constitution should be construed in any manner indicating any hostility toward religion".

The Court concluded by affirming the judgment of the trial court except that it held improper the practice of distributing "cards in the public schools, or the making of announcements or explanations for the purpose of obtaining the parents' consent for their children's participation in the released-time program, by representatives of religious groups or instructors in the schools".

In a brief concurring opinion Chief Justice Weaver pointed out that Article IX, Section 4 of the Washington State Constitution contains the following language: "all schools maintained or supported wholly or in part by the public funds shall be forever free from sectarian control or influence".

He added that this language "is more proscriptive than the other constitutional provisions discussed in the opinion" and that the Washington State Constitutional Convention of 1899, in adopting this provision, had specifically rejected a proposed amendment to strike the words "or influence" from the section.

SUBJECT: Erickson v. Sunset Memorial Park Association, Inc.

DATE: November 13, 1959

DIGEST: The District Court of Hennepin County, Minnesota, rules that the married purchasers of a cemetery lot, one of whom is of Indian origin and therefore not a Caucasian, are entitled to use the lot for their burial despite the fact that the lot they purchased was covered by a covenant limiting its use to members of the Caucasian race.

On July 23, 1959 District Court Judge William D. Gunn of the Fourth Judicial District of Minnesota ruled in favor of the plaintiffs in the case of Erickson v. Sunset Memorial Park Association, Inc. The plaintiffs were a married couple; the husband a Caucasian and the wife a full-blooded American Indian, and hence not deemed a member of the Caucasian race. The defendant, Sunset Memorial Park Association, Inc., was organized in 1899 as a private corporation for profit, limited by its charter to the business of procuring and holding land to be used exclusively for a cemetery. The defendant cemetery, known as Sunset Memorial Park, has been located in Hennepin County since 1927. All deeds and contracts for deeds, executed and delivered by the defendant to the purchasers of burial lots in Sunset Memorial Park have contained a covenant limiting the use of the burial property for interment of persons of the Caucasian race.

On August 26, 1955 the plaintiffs purchased a lot from the defendant and received a warranty deed containing the standard restriction against burial of non-Caucasians. On April 18, 1958, the defendant advised the plaintiff, Mrs. Erickson, that she could not be buried in her lot because of the restrictive covenant.

Upon receipt of the letter, the plaintiffs brought an action to compel the defendant to permit the burial of Mrs. Erickson in their plot. The defendant raised the racial covenant as a defense and sought rescission of the sale of the lot to the plaintiffs. The case came before the court on a motion for judgment on the pleadings. The court found that the only question of fact in the case was whether the plaintiffs, when they signed the purchase application, knew that it contained a representation on their part that they were both of the Caucasian race. If they were so aware, the defendant argued, the plaintiffs had used fraud to induce the contract. If they were not aware, there was an innocent mistake on both sides. In either case, according to the defendant, it had the right to seek rescission of the contract.

The court found that it was the established policy of the State of Minnesota to prohibit discrimination on the basis of race in the sale of public cemetery lots and interment therein. It referred to Minnesota's statute barring restrictive covenants in real estate deeds, mortgages and other instruments.

Whether or not the plaintiffs "knew" that they were misrepresenting that they were both of the Caucasian race, the court found that this question was not a "material fact" in the making of the contract and that therefore no right of rescission existed based on either mistake or fraud. The court also said that a person does not suffer any legal damage where "he is fraudulently induced to do something which he is under a legal obligation to do."

Noting that the question was not directly presented, the court went on to say that if the positions of the parties were reversed and the defendant were suing for cancellation or rescission, the question might then be raised as to whether or not the court, by granting such relief to the cemetery association, would be engaging in "state action" which violates the guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment as interpreted in Shelley v. Kramer.

In discussing "public policy" the court first noted that a Minnesota statute adopted in 1953 bars restrictive covenants affecting real estate based on race, creed or color. The court also noted that the 1957 Minnesota FEP law contained a general declaration by the Legislature that practices of discrimination against any of its inhabitants because of race, color, creed, religion, national origin or ancestry are a matter of state concern and are against the public policy of the state.

The court rejected the defendant's contention that the right of interment is a "special property right," pointing out that the conveyance here of the cemetery lot was like any other conveyance of real estate. The court acknowledged that a different question might be presented if the cemetery association were affiliated with a religious corporation and sought to restrict burial on the grounds of religion, but it pointed out that the defendant was not so affiliated. In discussing this, the court emphasized that the "decision here is not intended to even suggest that religious groups may not continue the practice of limiting interment in cemeteries affiliated with such groups to persons of a designated religious persuasion." On the other hand, the court pointed out that a public cemetery operated for profit without any religious affiliation may not engage in racial or religious discrimination.

The court concluded that Minnesota law indicated a public policy contrary to the defendant's position. The court specifically cited two decisions in California and Iowa which reached a contrary conclusion, but noted that in those cases there were no statutory enactments which clearly established state public policy against such restrictive provisions.

Having decided the matter on the basis of the public policy of the state as embodied in applicable statutes, the court concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment had no application to the case since "state action" was not involved. To the extent that the action taken by the court could be construed as "state action," the opinion noted that it "prohibits, rather than fosters, discrimination." The court also indicated that it saw no need to make a determination of the issue of "common law public policy" which had been raised by both parties since in Minnesota "the Legislature had spoken" on the subject.

The court concluded, "Plaintiff, Ramona Erickson is a descendant of those who not so long ago were the proud owners of all our land. Defendant is a corporation operated for profit....It would be a poor policy to deny to such the right to have their mortal remains lie together in this land in a public cemetery merely because of Mrs. Erickson's descent."

SUBJECT: Canadian Provincial Legislation Against Discrimination

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Paul Hartman

DATE: November 19, 1959

DIGEST: The Canadian provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have passed fair accommodation practices laws. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia have strengthened their fair employment practices laws.

Earlier this year the Canadian provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick passed fair accommodation practices laws. With these enactments the number of provinces with statutes barring discrimination in public places has risen to four. (Ontario adopted such a law in 1954 and Saskatchewan in 1956 -- see Joint Memoranda #68 and #158.)

Like the previous statutes, the newly enacted laws of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick prohibit anyone from denying to any person or class of persons, because of race, color, religion or national origin, the accommodations, services or facilities available "in any place to which the public is customarily admitted." These laws also prohibit publication or display of notices or signs indicating discrimination or an intent to discriminate "for any purpose." The laws provide administrative machinery for their enforcement. In addition, they authorize criminal prosecution of violators, with maximum fines of $400 and $100 in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively.

The number of provinces having fair accommodation practices laws may soon rise to five. The last session of the Manitoba Legislature adopted a resolution recommending "that the Government give favorable consideration to the introduction of a measure similar to measures enforced in some other provinces to prohibit any person from denying to any other person the accommodation, services or facilities available in any place to which the public is customarily admitted because of race, creed, color, nationality, ancestry or place of origin of that other person."

Two provincial FEPC laws -- those of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan -- were strengthened in 1959. The original Nova Scotia FEP act, adopted in 1955, applied only to employers of five or more persons. The 1959 amendment extends coverage to all employers, even those with just a single employee.

The amendment to the Saskatchewan FEP act of 1956 expressly prohibits questions or requests on employment application forms "for particulars as to race, religion, religious creed, color or ethnic or national origin of an applicant for employment unless a question or request for particulars is based upon a bona fide occupational qualification." This amendment was adopted because doubts had arisen in the administration of the original FEP measure as to whether such a prohibition was implicit in the provisions of the act.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

The AJC's new home in New York is called the Institute of Human Relations.

Watchdog of the Rights of Man

The American Jewish Committee will dedicate its new permanent headquarters in New York in January. To mark the occasion, WORLD OVER presents this article, another in its series of stories behind great American Jewish organizations.

by JACK LURIA

"MIKOYAN Denies Exiling of Jews" ran the headline on page 1 of The New York Times one day last January. The leaders of the American Jewish Committee had just met with the First Deputy Premier of the Soviet Union, then on an official visit to this country. The AJC had information that the Russians were planning to force Jews to settle in an area in Siberia called Birobidzhan. Was this true? Mr. Mikoyan said no. Did the Soviet government discriminate against its Jewish citizens? The First Deputy tugged at his mustache and protested, "I have many friends who are Jews." The Committee leaders said they were "gratified." (They were even more gratified a few weeks later when it became plain that the Soviet government was backing up its First Deputy on the matter of Birobidzhan.)

The meeting with Mikoyan, the only one he had with representatives of a Jewish organization, is but one example of the constant alertness of the American Jewish Committee. For over half a century it has been in the forefront of the struggle for the rights, not only of Jews, but of men everywhere. Today, with over 26,000 members in 600 communities, its influence is more widespread than ever in its lively history.

American Jewish Committee leaders meet with Russian representatives in New York to discuss Jewish problems in the Soviet Union. Left to right: Mikhail A. Menshikov, Soviet Ambassador to U. S., former Senator Herbert H. Lehman; Anastas I. Mikoyan, Soviet First Deputy Premier; Irving M. Engel, AJC president; and Jacob Blaustein, honorary president.

The American Jewish Committee came into being fifty-three years ago when a handful of distinguished American Jews came together to discuss matters of importance not only to Jews but to the world. Included in the group were some of the most famous men of their time: Jacob H. Schiff, a business leader and philanthropist; Louis Marshall, an outstanding lawyer; Cyrus Adler, a distinguished scholar who was secretary of the Smithsonian Institution; and Adolph Ochs, the publisher of The New York Times. Outrages like the Dreyfus Case and the mass murder of Jews in the Russian city of Kishinev stirred their hearts. In 1906, organized as the American Jewish Committee, they began to take action. They pledged themselves to do all they could to gain equality for their fellow Jews everywhere and to give relief to the victims of persecution and other disasters. The oldest Jewish organization in America devoted to civil liberties was on its way!

For a long time the Committee continued as a small group of Jewish leaders. Its members worked quietly, using reason and discussion to correct injustices. Sometimes this was not possible and they had to arouse public opinion to get action. Yet even though the Committee consisted of only fifty members as recently as 1936, its first thirty years were marked by some notable achievements. For much of this period the towering personality of Louis Marshall dominated the Committee's work. (See Attorney for His People, WORLD OVER, November 25, 1957).

Under Marshall's leadership the AJC encouraged the U.S. to do away with our commercial treaty with Russia because the Czar refused to honor the passports of American Jews. It strongly opposed laws which held immigration to a tiny trickle. It successfully defeated an Oregon law which challenged the right of parents to send their children to Catholic schools. It defended Mendel Beilis, a Russian Jewish watchman smeared with the old anti-Semitic charge of murdering children to use their blood. It spoke up for the American Leo M. Frank, the victim of similar anti-Jewish prejudice in Georgia.

Challenged by the terrible situation in which refugees found themselves after World War I, the Committee helped found the Joint Distribution Committee, which raised millions of dollars for Jewish overseas relief. After the war, AJC delegates at Versailles insisted that the rights of minorities be spelled out clearly in the peace treaties. While the Committee has always described itself as non-Zionist, it has long and continuously been concerned with the welfare of Palestine and later of Israel. It endorsed the Balfour declaration in 1918 and has always fought for the right of those Jews who wished or needed to go there to settle in our ancient homeland.

Standing proudly for democracy, the Committee has always sounded the alarm against dictatorship, both Fascist and Communist. Within weeks after Hitler took power in Germany, the AJC published the facts about the persecution of German Jews; 80,000 copies of The Jews in Nazi Germany helped to alert the world to the Nazi menace. The Committee continued its fight against Nazism by supporting the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League, which united people of all faiths, by helping German refugees to enter the United States, and by asking the League of Nations to take action against Hitler. Throughout World War II, the Committee took the lead in exposing the vicious cruelty of the Nazis and in giving relief to Jews who escaped the German murderers.

Not long after the victory against Fascism, the Committee began to recognize that human rights were endangered by tyranny from another direction —Communism. In the last ten years the AJC has published a number of carefully detailed reports on the condition of Jews and other minorities behind the Iron Curtain. Though Communists for years claimed that these eye-witness accounts were lies, Premier Khrushchev himself in his speech of February 1956 revealed that the charges made by the Committee were true.

The activities and interests of the American Jewish Committee have expanded boldly in recent years. It is no longer content simply with protesting injustices and trying to bring about laws which will spread equality among people. Today the Committee is even more concerned with reaching into the minds and hearts of people. It is discovering why hatred grows and how it can be replaced by love and understanding.

For example, in 1944 the Committee set a large staff of scholars to work on a scientific study of prejudice. The findings of these scholars, since published as a series of books called Studies in Prejudice, have had tremendous importance among teachers, social workers and psychologists—in fact, among everyone concerned with the way people get along with one another. Among other things, Studies in Prejudice showed that unprejudiced people were mentally healthier than others. In 1954 the Supreme Court backed up its famous decision for school integration by quoting from the Studies to show how children were harmed by being segregated.

In all ways possible to it the Committee has tried to educate people to work together to improve our democratic society. The AJC has bureaus in New York, London, Paris, and South America. Through special committees it carries its ideas to many groups—working people, college students, church members and veterans. It works with the U. S. Congress, the State Department, the UN, and interfaith groups. It publishes the highly respected monthly magazine, Commentary, and the American Jewish Yearbook, a kind of annual encyclopedia of Jewish progress and achievement. It uses every modern method to spread its message—pamphlets in all languages distributed by the thousands, radio, TV and motion pictures. One AJC film, Make Way for Youth, has already been seen by 30 million people.

Always the American Jewish Committee has its eyes on its goals: to help people live at peace with themselves and with each other, to protect all our rights and freedoms, to make the promise of American opportunity come true for everyone, and to make it possible for all men—Jews among the rest—to walk with heads lifted high.

Scene from Make Way for Youth, a film produced by the AJC and seen by millions of Americans.

FOR RELEASE THURSDAY DEC.10 AMs & PMs AND AFTER

New York, Dec. 9 ... The American Jewish Committee is initiating a long range series of studies, financed by a $250,000 foundation grant, to explore the effects of prejudice and discrimination upon the nation's economy and its manpower resources and other aspects of human relations.

The quarter of a million dollar grant was given by the Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation of Pittsburgh and the research project will be known as the Maurice Falk Studies.

Waste in manpower, morale and productivity resulting from discrimination costs American industry some $30 billion dollars a year, according to a recent report of the President's Committee on Contract Compliance.

Dr. John Slawson, Executive Vice President of the Committee, announced the broad-gauged research program as the first major study project of the Committee's new Institute of Human Relations. The Institute, a modern eight-story structure on 56th Street and Third Avenue, is a center of research and education in the field of human relations and serves also as the new national headquarters of the 53-year-old American Jewish Committee.

Dr. Slawson, executive head of the Committee, announced the research program at a luncheon honoring Samuel J. Bloomingdale, who was an early participant in the development of the Institute of Human Relations. The Institute is on the site of the original Bloomingdale store which was opened in the Spring of 1872 by Mr. Bloomingdale's father, Lyman G. Bloomingdale. Samuel J. Bloomingdale was born on June 17,1873, in an apartment above that original store.

At a special ceremony, Mr. Bloomingdale unveiled a plaque on the Third Avenue side of the Institute (originally 938 Third Avenue) to mark the site of the modest Bloomingdale beginnings.

In a statement at the luncheon, Mr. Bloomingdale, approaching his 86th birthday, pointed out that New York City's lanndmarks and historic sites are "rapidly disappearing." He called upon "our city's leaders in business, industry, the arts and public life, to set a fashion of putting up plaques on important historic sites in New York. In this way, our grandchildren and future generations will come to understand how a great city grows out of human hope, energy and dedication." (Photo of Mr. Bloomingdale and plaque unveiling attached.)

Dr. Slawson, outlining the purpose and scope of the Maurice Falk Studies, stressed that "there is no greater challenge before the American people today than the effective utilization of its human resources." He cited recent studies of managerial requirements in American industry, projected over the next twenty years which predicted "acute shortages of essential high talent." This would come about unless established practices in the field of executive selection and development are focused "increasingly upon the worth of the individual" rather than his ethnic or religious affiliation.

The Maurice Falk Studies program, Dr. Slawson declared, will be unique in their interdisciplinary character. "Heretofore, studies probing our human resources have been regarded as the special province of economists or educators. With this new program, planned and coordinated by the AJC, the studies will utilize individuals trained in industrial management, political science, education, sociology, and psychology, who will constitute study and research teams," Dr.Slawson said.

One of the areas for study will be the field of executive recruitment and development in American corporate enterprise. This would be joined with campus studies of occupational interests and choices of students — Christian and Jewish, White and Negro. The campus studies would investigate: the students' estimate of opportunity of advancement in their chosen or preferred field; the extent to which occupational choices of the members of minority groups appear to differ from those of the majority and the reasons for the difference, the influence of the family, the fear of discrimination and other factors affecting occupational choice.

The impact of discrimination on the economics of housing will also be an important area of research for the Maurice Falk Studies. To be explored are the effects of both segregated and integrated housing on land values, and on the economy of local communities. Dr. Slawson said that available studies in this area "are highly contradictory" and that objective material "is sorely needed as a basis for intelligent citizen action."

Citizenship duties and responsibilities as affected by economic discrimination will be another major emphasis in the study program. Barriers to full-fledged participation by minorities in the political areas of national life would be investigated, as would the responsibility of members of minority groups "to participate fully and constructively in the political and communal life of the community, state and nation."

The Committee anticipates, Dr. Slawson declared, that the results of the campus, community and industry studies would provide "substantial raw, factual data for systematic consideration by educators, industrialists and civic leaders." He added:

"One such conference would seek to involve educators and practitioners in business administration, as well as personnel directors and management executives of major corporations. They would consider such issues as the degree to which the market for potential executives is currently being tapped, and the loss of such potential due to ethnic, racial and religious exclusionary policies and the economic cost to the nation of discrimination against members of these groups."

In the last two decades there has arisen an increased awareness of the "tragic human waste resulting from racial and religious discrimination in employment." Since the end of World War II, Dr. Slawson said, action on the part of private employers and government has produced a situation in which employment without regard to race or religion, particularly at the rank and file job level, is becoming increasingly the standard of American business and industry." However, he added, "this is not true of employment at the higher echelons of American industry."

Frederick F. Greenman, Chairman of the Committee's Executive Board, who presided at the luncheon, declared that human relations problems, particularly those involving racial and religious prejudice, can be "the most explosive evil of our time."

He stressed that "government on all levels — city, state and federal — have a primary duty to initiate, encourage and support research and function in many diverse areas of human relations." He declared that voluntary agencies alone cannot handle this extremely complex problem.

The Falk Foundation, established in 1929, makes grants primarily for research studies of economic problems affecting the domestic economy of the United States and for projects and programs to further the efforts of American colleges and universities to prepare their students for avocational participation in politics as a responsibility of American citizenship.

Leon Falk, Jr., is Chairman of the Foundation and Dr.J. Steele Gow is Executive Director.

The 53-year-old American Jewish Committee is the pioneer human relations agency in this country combating bigotry, protecting civil and religious rights of Jews and advancing the cause of human rights everywhere. It has especially pioneered in the use of science to study prejudice and discrimination and has produced the well-known five-volume Studies in Prejudice as a major work in the field.

Annual Meeting Huge Success

President Rood Reports

'59 IN RETROSPECT—LOOK AT '60

As the year comes to a close, Col. Nathan B. Rood, president of our AJC Chapter, has written a fine summary and projection. We believe that he should be commended for its preparation—this report surely exemplifies the strong leadership that Col. Rood has exerted since his assuming the presidency a year ago.

During the last 12 months, many matters arose, engaging the attention of the American Jewish Committee—matters of international, national and local import.

1. Jews Behind the Iron Curtain:

The meeting of the A.J.C. leaders with Soviet Deputy Premier, Anastas Mikoyan, on his visit to this country resulted in a formal statement by the Soviet authorities that they did not intend to revive the Jewish settlement in Biro-Bidzhan.

Jacob Blaustein, an Honorary President of the Committee, was sent on a government mission to Poland to study the economic and community needs of that country.

2. Jews of West Germany:

The Committee called attention to the growing Anti-Semitism in West Germany. In April this resulted in

An Outstanding Event in Chapter's History

GREAT PLANS FOR '60

Under the able leadership of Alvin Cassel, with the cooperation of scores of members who worked untiring at their assignment, with the imaginative direction of the Workshop by Jack I. Green, culminated by a dramatic and spirited speech by Morris Abram of Atlanta, this year's Annual Workshop and Meeting has won the praise of all the membership. Such laurels are well deserved by all those who masterminded the event.

Who but Jack Green would come up with (1) tape recorded conversations with youngsters all over Greater Miami, who unhesitatingly presented youth's ideas on its own problems, and (2) a filmed summary of the Workshop only 90 minutes after it was concluded (with sound, yet!)?

Well attended, the adult members of AJC were especially impressed with the Workshop's youthful but highly preceptive resource people, who all hold positions of responsibility in the University of Miami's student body. Those who fired the imagination of the participants were Jay B. Hess, Henry Edgar, Steve Slepin, David Yellen and Stuart Fabric.

We all owe Jack, his own staff, and all the Workshop workers a debt of gratitude. They truly sparked a clear "Spotlight on Youth."

Moving on to the Annual Meeting, every one who had a hand in the arrangements and the hundreds of details that are taken care of behind the scenes blended their interest and abilities to create an outstanding eveing. Of course, the highlight was the return of Morris Abram, who two years ago set the membership back on its heels and who once again challenged us and moved us with amazing ease. Here certainly is one of the most intelligent statesman in the South today.

Picking up points as he dropped them across the stage with a determined zeal, we gleaned this summary from Leo Mindlin of the Jewish Floridian: Juvenile crime represents a major challenge to the survival of the nation's great cities as centers where decent people can live . . . .

He denied that the statistically low rate of teen-age delinquency reduces its significance it impact on contemporary civilization . . . . Problems of the young among us mirror those of the adult world.

He charged that the majority no longer cares about the third among us who are ill-clothed, ill-housed and ill-fed. He said that these had champions in the '30's; today there is silence . . . .

But it is this third of our population that is slowly taking over our cities, while the privileged flee.

Out of a host of dedicated people, here are the three that pulled the team together to make our annual Workshop-Meeting such a huge success. They are (left to right) Alvin Cassel, overall chairman of the event; Jack I. Green, creative chairman of the workshop; and Morris Abram, dynamic speaker and statesman.

We seek status quo . . . . youth need not look for jobs; jobs seek youth . . . "Among college students today, I find more interest in Freud than in economics."

He discussed rehabilitation and capital punishment and the need for the extensive re-evaluation of our laws and our methods of detections "which must be more scientific than a $300-a-month policeman — frequently a social misfit—can bring to the task."

What are the principal characters of the juvenile offender? The normal youngster testing the limit of his power in normal environments; the youngster made abnormal by abnormal environment; the disturbed, neurotic, psychotic child . . .

Blaming adults for creating circumstances which upset the equilibrium of youth, with special emphasis on material things today, "these children ultimately deduce freedom to be acquisitive. This is crime in its essence, with youthful wrongdoers infiltrating the cities to make of them giant jungles.

"We are permitting new barbarians, who don't want to be barbarians, to sack all our Romes."

The solution? We must approach this indictment of ourselves "with new flights of imagination."

The man, the meeting . . . the whole day . . . SENSATIONAL!

our receiving assurances from the German Federal Republic that that subject would receive serious attention at a forthcoming conference of Ministers of Education.

3. Latin-American Jewry:

Our delegation to Latin America covered an area and approximately 600,000 Jews living in a Catholic-dominated culture. In addition, consideration is being given to a Miami Chapter proposal that a special sociological study be made of Jewish Life in Mexico.

4. Jewish Life in Europe:

The Committee continued its program in collaboration with the Alliance Israelite Universelle and the Anglo-Jewish Association, of further support for the development of religious and cultural lives of various Jewish communities in West Europe.

The close ties between the Committee and the Pro Deo Institute in Rome were further cemented during the past year.

5. Middle East Affairs:

The problem of Jews in North Africa and their interests in the Middle East continued to be our active concern during the past year. In Miami, the Chapter sponsored, in conjunction with other organizations, a special study of Middle East conditions held recently at the University of Miami.

6. Activities in the South:

The problems of integration and segregation, the position of the Jews in the South, the rise of Anti-Semitism,—all received increased attention during the past year.

7. Youth Problems:

Our concern with the problems of youth needs little further elaboration. The Committee is actively engaged in the research of and preparation for the coming Youth Conference called by President Eisenhower for the Spring of 1960. Our Chapter has been responsible for some of the key recommendations which will be made by the Florida State delegation to the National Conference.

8. Scientific Research:

The American Jewish Committee continued its never ending scientific approach towards the solution of social problems.

9. Improving Inter-Group Understanding:

Believing that a harmonious community can best solve its general problems, A. J. C. has continued its work with other agencies such as the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the National Education Association, The American Association for the United Nations, the Y.M. and Y.M.C.A. and many others, both sectarian and non-sectarian, in promoting inter-group understanding.

10. Teaching of Religion in Schools:

With a continuing sensitivity for the need to handle the Church-State problems with a minimum of dislocation in community relations, we have endeavored to seek the elimination of religious activities from the public schools.

11. Jewish Attitude Studies in Miami:

Long aware that the way in which people regard themselves affects the way others regard them, we have instituted surveys of Jewish attitudes in key communities of the United States. One of the most ambitious of these studies has been undertaken by us in Miami and will be completed during the coming year.

Our primary interest is not so much with the problems themselves, but also with their causes—not so much with individual incidents as they arise, but with the hidden sparks that cause them to generate. We are concerned not so much with what is happening to us, but what may happen to our children. We "dig" deeply to ascertain these causes and we design our programs to eliminate or prevent these causes. We gear ourselves to long range programs designed to promote better understanding between peoples, groups and cultures; designed to eliminate discrimination in employment, housing, social groups and fraternities; designed to afford every American, regardless of background or belief, equality of opportunity.

Such goals may to many seem hopeless of attainment. But goals such as they have been crossed before and will continue to be crossed.

To do so we must continue to enlist the voluntary services of people dedicated to the same beliefs, willing to devote an important measure of their time and effort. We must develop leaders and thinkers who are trained to recognize the causes of group discontent and friction and who know the techniques used in the eradication of evil causes. Ours is a group movement involving people of good will who are interested in human betterment, who realize that Democracy cannot be taken for granted but must be cared for with a singular devotion in order to be preserved.

These were our aims in 1959. These will continue to be our guide posts in the future.

Specific tasks for our Chapter in 1960? Yes, just to list a few:

1. More active participation by the Advisory Board in the affairs of our Committee.

2. A study of the cultural, social and economic conditions of the Latin-American people in our area.

3. A study of Anti-Semetic undertones in the various high schools in our area.

4. Increased participation of our membership in committee functions, in our discussion groups, and in our humanitarian concerns.

5. Continued insistence in the creation of an official County Community Relations Agency.

6. Greater activity toward the elimination of discrimination in housing, employment, social groups, fraternities, et cetera.

7. Amelioration of the many problems of our migrant labor population.

Election Summary

OFFICERS, EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE NAMED

As a traditional part of the Annual Meeting, the membership elects the AJC leadership for the coming year.

The complete slate of officers is found on the masthead of this issue. Among those named to the Executive Committee, following the recommendation of the Nominating Committee headed by Charlie Finkelstein, were: Alvin Cassel, Leo A. Chaiken, Mrs. Charles Finkelstein, Allen I. Freehling, Melvyn B. Frumkes, William E. Gladstone and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Goldstein.

Also, Jack I. Green, Jerome G. Greene, James R. Katzman, Irvin Korach, Mrs. Jane B. Leeds, Raymond Lewis, Seymour B. Liebman, Ernest J. London, Robert Macht and Herbert L. Markow.

And, Mrs. A. Herbert Mathes, Van Myers, Rabbi Joseph R. Narot, Lee Ruwitch, Admiral H. R. Sobel (Ret.), Mrs. Bernard R. Stevens and Richard Wolfson.

The Executive Committee convenes once a month and many of its meetings are open to the general membership. Those wishing to attend should contact the office for further details.

Plan to Attend One

Workshop Set—Religion In Public Schools

Audrey (Mrs. Charles) Finkelstein, chairman of the education committee, who was recently elected president of Dade County Girl Scout Council, has announced that January 11th should be saved by all of us for an important event.

On that evening, there will be three concurrent workshops on "Religion in the Public Schools" in which speakers and panelists will appear from AJCommittee, AJCongress and the ADL.

Sponsored by the Joint Advisory Committee, the 8 o'clock sessions will be held at Temple Beth Sholem on Miami Beach, Beth David Congregation in southwest Miami and Congregation of Monticello Park in North Miami Beach.

"Members," says Audrey, "especially parents of children in our Dade County schools, are urged to attend the workshop in their neighborhoods. I cannot overstress the importance of this meeting."

Now's Your Chance to Work

COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN APPOINTED

AJC President Nathan B. Rood has announced the names of committee chairmen, who will serve during the new year.

In announcing these appointments, Col Rood urges all the membership to give serious consideration as to which committee seems most interesting; then contact the office and volunteer to serve.

Every committee needs your help —the chairmen can't do the job assigned to them without strong backing and support.

Here's a resume of the appointments: David R. Hochberg, budget; Melvyn B. Frumkes, civil liberties; Mrs. Nathan B. Rood, discussion groups; Mrs. Charles Finkelstein, education; Irvin Korach, housing; and Charles Finkelstein, Jewish Attitudes Survey and social discrimination.

Also Mrs. Bernard Stevens, Jewish communal affairs; Lee Ruwitch, mass media; Mrs. David P. Catsman and Mrs. James R. Katzman, program; Mrs. Louis F. Rogel, telephone; and James R. Katzman, youth; Mr. Seymour Liebman, international affairs; Mr. Stuart Simon, church-state affairs; Mrs. Peritz Scheinberg, annual meeting arrangements; Mr. Allen Freehling, Satellite; Mr. Herbert L. Markow, fact-finding.

Basic Education

With all the current fuss about "frills" versus basic education in this country, it's interesting to learn what Eskimo youngsters in Thule, Greenland, are studying these days. They're learning the three R's, of course, reports the National Parent-Teacher. But in addition, they study kayak building, dog-team driving, harpooning, the use of firearms, and the sewing of skins.

And we thought "life-adjustment classes were only for "higher" civilizations.

Charles Finkelstein Reports

Jewish Attitudes Survey

The survey of Jewish attitudes, under discussion for over a year, has emerged from the planning stages and is now actually under way.

Charles Finkelstein, Chairman of the Survey Committee, reports that interviewers are out in the field obtaining answers from several hundred Jewish residents of Dade County.

The survey here parallels a number of similar surveys conducted by AJC in other communities in other sections of the country. Our study will therefore be adding another section to the picture that AJC is gradually drawing of the attitudes, beliefs and practices of Jews throughout the United States. It will also serve as a basis for our own program planning —and that of other Dade County Jewish organizations and institutions —so it will conform to the realities of local Jewish patterns, rather than guesses or assumptions.

Mr. Finkelstein paid tribute to the intensive efforts made by the members of his committee and its various subcommittees. Mrs. Leo Ackerman headed a group which articulated the particular concerns and issues in Greater Miami which were later incorporated into the questionnaire by sociologists of the AJC national staff. Herbert Markow gathered vast amounts of population data which provided the facts upon which the sample design was evolved.

Mrs. Jean C. Lehman, recruited, and is leading the twelve captains and 65 interviewers who are conducting the interviews. Manheim Shapiro, Director of National AJC's Jewish Communial Affairs Department, conducted six two-hour training sessions for these interviewers in the last week. Mrs. Charles Leeds will head the coding operation which will convert the responses to the questionnaires into numerical terms which can then be tabulated by IBM machines.

It was predicted that the survey findings will have great significance for many organizations in the community. This has happened in other communities where such surveys were conducted. The Chapter regards the study as a service to the community and will be pleased to make relevant data available to temples and synagogues, Federation, men's and women's organizations and Jewish centers for appropriate use by them when the final tabulations and analysis are completed.

Discussion Groups Roundup

THEY'RE MEETING ALL AROUND THE TOWN

Discussion groups are "going like '60" (no pun intended) and we hope that all membership will join at least one of these informative, provocative and stimulating groups.

Knowing that it would be impossible for each member to attend every group's sessions, the chairmen are preparing reports that will be summarized in issues of the SATELLITE.

Before giving you the recap, we again urge that you call the office to find the schedule of the discussion group nearest your home. We guarantee some evenings you'll never forget!

HENDRIK BERNS COVERS "THE MIDDLE EAST AND PEACE"

Gloria Kramer reports that Hendrik Berns, well known Miami News writer, gave an in-depth summary of the Middle East today, as he served as resource for a group meeting at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Robert Hyams.

In addition to reviewing last month's Israeli elections, in which 24 parties were on the ballot, an election that was precipitated by the German-Israel arms deal, Mr. Berns guided the group in a heated discussion on Israel, its influence on peace in the Middle East and its relationship to all the world's Jewry.

JOHN B. ORR—"THE PRACTICAL AND PRACTICING LIBERAL"

Under the supervision of Dr. and Mrs. Jerome A. Kramer, who are really coming up with some tremendous programs, John B. Orr was invited to meet with a group at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Beer.

Mr. Orr's definition of liberals: "people who are least resistant to change." He cited Britain as a country willing to experiment and went on to say that only in a nation where there is freedom and willingness to experiment can a sound government continue.

The former State legislator's beliefs and experiences gave rise to an unforgettable discussion in which all the group pitched in.

SUE STEVENS—"GOVERNMENT CENSORSHIP OF PUBLIC MEDIA"

Recently returned from an AJC seminar at Chattanooga, Sue (Mrs. Bernard) Stevens ably led a group discussion on "Censorship by Government of Groups of Public Media; e.g., Radio, Television, Motion Pictures and Literature." They met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Schainuck.

The group became familiar with the problems presented by reviewing several case histories. Many members felt that there should be some supervision of the media, lest minority groups suffer. However, no one suggested the suppression of a difference of view or the presentation of a doctrine.

It was concluded by the group, which is coordinated by Mel Frumkes, that any government censorship might be bad because of the possible danger stemming from an over-zealous public official's action in doing his job as censor.

"OPEN OCCUPANCY FOR AMERICAN CITIES"

by Donald S. Frey

Donald S. Frey is president of the Evanston (Ill.) Human Relations Council, a lawyer and expert in Municipal Law.

His carefully documented article, "Open Occupancy for American Cities" (enclosed), is a concise and lucid presentation of factors which have led to the adoption of open occupancy laws, how the laws function, how to obtain the passage of fair housing legislation, and the roles and responsibilities of government and other agencies.

We believe you will find the article useful as a reference piece, and for orienting board members of intergroup agencies and civic leaders.

DEDICATION OF THE INSTITUTE OF HUMAN RELATIONS . . .

The American Jewish Committee has created the Institute of Human Relations as a center for research and study, a meeting place for students, scholars, opinion molders, religious and civic leaders—for all men of wisdom and good will who are concerned with "man's understanding of his fellow man."

To launch the Institute on its mission, the week of January 18, 1960, will be devoted to a series of conferences among persons of attainment in the social sciences, in religion, education, mass communication and civic affairs. They will consider how knowledge in their respective fields can best contribute to the strengthening of intergroup relations. From these deliberations the Institute will derive its guidelines for the immediate future.

GENTLEMEN:

I will attend the Conference on Mass Communication and Intergroup Relations on January 21, 1960.

SPECIAL NATIONAL TV PROGRAM

MARKING THE DEDICATION OF

THE INSTITUTE OF HUMAN RELATIONS

A most exceptional, "live" TV program will be telecast by the National Broadcasting Company network, in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee, during the dedication week of the Institute of Human Relations, on

SUNDAY, JANUARY 24, 2:00 to 3:00 P.M., EST

The presentation will be an adaptation of "Destiny's Tot," one of the "true psychoanalytic tales" in Dr. Robert Lindner's book, "The Fifty-Minute Hour" (which is available where paperback books are sold in a Bantam edition at 35¢). The president of the American Jewish Committee, Mr. Herbert B. Ehrmann, will deliver a message at the end of the program.

We have reason to believe that this will be one of the most distinguished productions of its type ever presented on TV. It is extremely timely in view of the current desecrations of places of worship in West Germany and elsewhere. We hope that all who have concern about these manifestations of bigotry will help obtain the widest possible audience for this unusually significant program. Please see the enclosed copy of an item which was published in today's New York Times. It contains a brief synopsis of the story.

The excellent cooperation received in publicizing our recent program, "The Children of Strangers," encourages us to repeat (with modifications) the suggestions made previously. Please --

1. Request the program director of the NBC-TV station in your community to schedule the program (or if this is impossible, to carry it on a "delayed telecast basis").

2. Ask TV editors to give it special advance notice. Place newspaper ads, under the auspices of an appropriate local organization or group of organizations, in the daily press.

3. Arrange with religious, fraternal, civic, etc. organizations to announce the program in their bulletins. National Religious and Human Relations Organizations: Please encourage the participation of your regional offices in publicizing the program. Local Religious and Human Relations Organizations: Please publicize to your members and constituent groups.

4. Urge clergy of all faiths to announce the program from their pulpits.

5. Arrange (religious and human relations organizations especially) parlor listening groups to view the program and discuss its implications for the community.

6. Mail postcard announcements to members of your organizations and others.

7. After the event, let us have your reactions to the program.

We shall greatly appreciate your cooperation.

N.B.C. TO TELEVISE STORY BY LINDNER

Special Program Jan. 24 Will Deal With Rabble-Rouser -- Anti-Semitism is Theme
By Richard F. Shepard

"Destiny's Tot," the case history of an anti-Semitic rabble-rouser will be dramatized in a special telecast by the National Broadcasting Company on Sunday, Jan. 24.

The hour-long show, beginning at 2 P.M., will be presented by N.B.C. in cooperation with the American Jewish Committee. Dr. John Slawson, the committee's executive vice president, said it would mark the dedication of his group's new Institute of Human Relations at Third Avenue and East Fifty-sixth Street.

The story is one of those in "The Fifty-Minute Hour," written by the late Dr. Robert Lindner, who was a prison psychologist. S. Lee Pogostin is adapting it for television.

It is a study of a young man who led a storm-trooper group in this country until he was jailed during World War II. There, the prison psychologist, a Jew, learns what made him turn into the sort of person he has become and finally achieves rapport and a "cure" for the inmate.

Fielder Cook will be the director. No performers have yet been cast. Marilyn Kaemmerle is the producer for N.B.C.'s public affairs unit and Milton Krents is producer for the committee.

Dr. Lindner's book was first published by Rinehart & Co., Inc., in 1955. Another selection from it, "The Jet-Propelled Couch," was presented on the Columbia Broadcasting System's "Playhouse 90."

SUBJECT: Progress Development Corp. v. Mitchell
(Deerfield, Illinois, Housing Controversy)

FROM: Paul Hartman and Theodore Leskes

DATE: March 29, 1960

DIGEST: Federal District Court of Illinois dismisses an action by the sponsors of an integrated housing development in the Village of Deerfield, Illinois, charging a conspiracy of city officials and citizens' groups to oust the development from the Village and to violate plaintiffs' civil rights. The court expresses the view that the maintenance of "benign quotas" in integrated housing developments is unconstitutional.

THE FACTS

Progress Development Corp. is an Illinois corporation having as its principal purpose the development of residential areas and the construction and sale of residential housing. Its stock is fully owned by Modern Community Developers, Inc., a New Jersey corporation, specializing in investing its capital in housing development corporations such as Progress.

In April 1959 Progress acquired 22 acres of vacant land in Deerfield, a suburb of Chicago, with intention to construct thereon two housing developments consisting of 51 houses. In November 1959, when the construction was well under way, it became known that both projects were to be racially integrated with 10 to 12 of the 51 houses reserved for Negroes. This plan aroused violent opposition in the community, in which no Negroes reside. Shortly thereafter, the construction of two model homes in the development was stopped by the building authorities of Deerfield for alleged violations of the building code. Also, the area Park District started condemnation proceedings to create a public park on the land in question. An offer made to Progress by the Park District to purchase the property for $166,999.91 was rejected on the ground that it was inadequate. On December 21, 1959 the plan to create a park on the land in question was approved by a referendum of the village voters.

THE CHARGE

Progress and Modern brought an action in the Federal District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, against the Village of Deerfield, its Board of Trustees, the Deerfield Park District and its Board, and a number of individuals. The action was based on the provision of the Federal Civil Rights Law authorizing a civil action for damages and for injunctive relief for deprivation of civil rights and for conspiracy to interfere with civil rights (42 USCA 1981 to 1983, 1985, 1988). The plaintiffs charged that the officials of Deerfield and of the Park District, acting under color of law and using their offices as a cloak, conspired among themselves and with other individuals to deprive the plaintiffs of their right to hold, sell and convey real property. They charged also that the "stop orders" of the building inspector and the condemnation proceedings were resorted to by the Village and Park District officials solely for the purpose of preventing the plaintiffs from constructing a racially integrated housing development in the Village and that such acts constituted an abuse of power. The plaintiffs asked for injunctions against the Village Board of Trustees and the Park District and for damages in the sum of $750,000. The court granted a temporary restraining order against the Board of Trustees but refused to grant such an order against the Park District, which had instituted condemnation proceedings.

THE JUDGMENT

After a trial without a jury, Judge Perry dismissed the action and dissolved the temporary injunction which had been granted. In his 72-page opinion, the Court held that the plaintiffs had failed to prove any combination or conspiracy among the defendants to interfere with the plaintiffs' civil rights. He found that the interest of the park commissioners in acquiring the land for park purposes was of long standing and was not created by the plaintiffs' plan to erect an integrated housing development on the site. He found evidence that there exists a bona fide public need to acquire the area for park purposes. The Court further found that the action of the building commissioner in issuing stop orders against the plaintiff's builder was authorized by law in view of repeated violations of the building code and that such action was neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, but in conformity with the customs and practices in Deerfield. He admitted that the building inspector, in his dealings with plaintiff, displayed ill temper, was arbitrary in manner and exceeded his authority in conversation with plaintiffs' agents and employees. But the Judge added, "where discourteous conduct ... is connected with performance of official duties it is no violation of civil rights." The Court stressed that plaintiffs had failed to pursue administrative remedies against the stop orders and that a federal court was not the proper forum to complain against the legal acts of the village and park authorities.

COURT'S VIEWS ON CONTROLLED INTEGRATION PLAN

The Judge in his opinion also dealt with the racially controlled occupancy plan envisaged by the plaintiffs for the housing developments in Deerfield. He quoted the plaintiffs' statements in court that their plan called for a white-Negro ratio in each development of approximately 80 to 20, and that this ratio would be maintained by an agreement made between Progress and each purchaser, under which Progress would get the exclusive right to select a purchaser of the property in the event of a resale. Progress stated that it would resell each parcel of property to a person of the same race as the original purchaser in order to maintain the initial ratio of whites and Negroes.

Noting that this was not a "voluntary plan," as claimed by the plaintiff, but a plan controlled by the developer, the Judge expressed the view that this plan "is clearly a device to restrict the conveyance of real property to persons of a certain race." The plan, the Judge stated, was "an evident effort to circumvent the law as laid down in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, and in Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60." (Shelley v. Kraemer decided that racial restrictive covenants could not be enforced in the courts; Buchanan v. Warley held unconstitutional zoning ordinances using racial criteria.) Such a controlled integration plan, containing discriminatory restrictions, amounted to a quota system of housing and was unenforceable by any court, in the Judge's opinion. He quoted as authority the Supreme Court decision in Hughes v. Superior Court, 339 U.S. 460. In that case the Supreme Court upheld an injunction issued by a California court against picketing of a retail store by Negroes to compel the store owner so to hire his employees that they would be in proportion to the racial origin of his customers. The Supreme Court agreed with the California court that a quota system such as that advocated by the picketers in the Hughes case, requiring as it did employment on racial lines, was inherently discriminatory.

The Judge concluded his comments on the controlled integration plan by stating that "if a quota of 80 to 20 , founded upon unrecorded restrictive agreements is constitutional, then a quota of 50 to 50 or 99 to 1, or even 100 to 0, would be constitutional, and Shelley v. Kraemer, supra, would be circumvented."

On the basis of these considerations, the Judge in his specific conclusions of law, stated that the "controlled occupancy pattern which the plaintiff planned to use was racial discrimination in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution and in violation of the Federal Civil Rights Law and therefore unenforceable in any court of the United States. The power of a federal court could not be invoked to impose any percentage quota of Negroes or Caucasians, nor could state powers be constitutionally employed to control either the original or subsequent use or occupancy of realty on a quota basis.

NOTE: This is, so far as we know, the first decision of a Federal court indicating that a so-called "benign quota" in a housing development is unconstitutional as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's requirement of equal protection of the laws. (A "benign quota" is a system under which a fixed ratio is established in terms of race or ethnic origin for the occupancy of a housing development, for the purpose of achieving and maintaining integration. By means of such a quota on occupancy by members of minority groups, this system seeks to avoid the danger that projects, to which members of minority groups are admitted without limitation, often become occupied almost exclusively by members of such groups.)

Although this holding by Judge Perry was unnecessary to support the dismissal of the complaint in the present case, and may therefore be considered mere dictum, nevertheless it will have impact on future discussions of the legality, propriety and desirability of a "benign quota" system.

SUBJECT: Massachusetts Law Against Discrimination in the Granting of Mortgage Loans

FROM: Paul Hartman and Theodore Leskes

DATE: April 15, 1960

Digest: Massachusetts amends its law against discrimination to make discrimination in the granting of mortgage loans an "unlawful practice."

On March 7, 1960 Governor Foster Furcolo of Massachusetts signed into law a bill prohibiting any person engaged in the business of granting mortgage loans from discriminating against any person in the granting of such a loan because of his race, color, religious creed, national origin or ancestry. The law mentions, by way of example, discrimination in the interest rate or in the terms or duration of the mortgage loan as falling under the ban.

The power to enforce the prohibition is vested in the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, which administers the other anti-bias laws of the Commonwealth.

NOTE: Similar laws against discrimination in the granting of mortgage loans were enacted in 1955 in New Jersey and in 1957 in the State of Washington.

SUBJECT: New York City's Fair Housing Ordinance Upheld

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: April 20, 1960

DIGEST: The New York City Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs ordinance, against discrimination in privately owned multiple dwellings and individual homes built in units of ten or more, is held constitutional.

On April 5, 1960, Mr. Justice Aron Steuer of the New York State Supreme Court, New York County, upheld the constitutionality of the Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs ordinance directed against discrimination based on race, color or religion in privately owned and operated multiple dwellings. The action arose when a real estate operator in Greenwich Village announced his intention to defy the ordinance and brought an action for a declaratory judgment that the ordinance was unconstitutional.

Mr. Justice Steuer pointed out that the plaintiff's complaint against the statute is that it is an unjustified interference with his property rights in his business. The plaintiff claims that a vital element of success in his real estate business is the selection of tenants and that any regulation which hampers the exercise of his judgment in this phase of his business is beyond the power of the state. The Court pointed out that all that the ordinance does is to say that "because a man is a negro (sic.) he is not, ipso facto, an undesirable tenant." The Judge added that it has long been recognized that the state has the power to make many regulations in regard to rental housing. He said, "It is now believed that many of our problems arising from the diverse nature of our population will be brought nearer solution by integration." He noted that New York has state laws forbidding racial discrimination in hiring and that "These have been found constitutionally unobjectionable."

The Judge next referred to the plaintiff's claim that many landlords do what the plaintiff claims the right to do, but they do it by stealth and indirection, which he scorns. Acknowledging that the plaintiff is probably right, the Court concluded that the fact that some evade the statutory prohibition is no reason for nullifying the statute.

Referring to the plaintiff's argument that Negro tenants would "in one way or another eventually lessen his rental income," the Court said, "Obviously, if the purposes of the statute are effected, this cannot be true." The Court concluded that whether or not it is ture, "it is an additional instance where the individual must yield to what legislative authority deems is for the common good."

The Court, therefore, found the ordinance constitutional.

Is the suburb becoming a "gilded ghetto"?

BY ALBERT I. GORDON

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY OSCAR HANDLIN

REVEALED IN DETAIL . . .

THE SUBURBS OF BOSTON

WASHINGTON

CLEVELAND

MINNEAPOLIS

LOS ANGELES

In all the flood of books and articles about the biggest mass migration in recent history—the American tidal wave into suburban living — there has been no authoritative, detailed discussion of the effect of suburbia on the Jewish community, or of the effect of the Jews upon suburbia. According to Harvard's noted Pulitzer Prize historian, Oscar Handlin, Jews in Suburbia is "the first effort to look seriously into the heart of this phenomenon in search of a meaning." Two-thirds of America's Jews "live in or adjacent to ten of America's largest cities," as Rabbi Gordon points out.

The author pulls no punches. He asks, "Is the suburb in danger of becoming a gilded ghetto?" Jews of the older generation, the immigrant generation, sought out each other for security and thus created their own ghettos, he reminds us, but the American Jew of today is no longer a citizen by sufferance; he is a citizen by right of birth — and no responsible Jewish leader wants to see a segregated suburbia. Yet the tendency in that direction, vexing though it may be, cannot be ignored. "Ghettos tend to be created unwittingly; they are seldom deliberate creations," Rabbi Gordon says. "For example, the increasing present tendency to develop 'residential club' communities closed to Jews, as is true in certain suburbs of Newark, forces Jews into other suburbs in greater numbers . . ."

Jews in Suburbia answers such questions as these: "How are Jews faring in suburbia? What is happening to their family life, their children, their religious values and practices? How do they relate to their Christian neighbors, and how do these in turn relate to the Jews? Do Jews have a will to live as Jews? Why do Jews move into suburbia? Are ritual and ceremony on the way out?"

Writing with the candor of a sociologist, and with the vigor and clarity of a journalist, Rabbi Gordon, who has an M.A. in sociology and a Ph.D. in anthropology, probes deeply into the life of the Jews and their Christian neighbors in the suburbs. He specifically names 89 such suburbs — from Alhambra, California, to White Plains, New York—which he has visited and studied personally.

This book is not a dry, factual report for the archives; it is full of factual, detailed case reports on the ghetto problem; family patterns, quotations from residents of suburbia, there is indignation in it, and hope, and living drama.

OSCAR HANDLIN: "Rabbi Gordon's work is the first effort to look seriously into the heart of this phenomenon in search of a meaning. It treats the Jews involved dispassionately and yet sympathetically. It raises important questions about their development as a group and as a significant segment of American society."

Says DR. LOUIS FINKLESTEIN of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America: "This study of Jewish suburban life has long been overdue, and I am glad that it is now being handled so competently."

HARRY GOLDEN, author of Only in America, says: "Jews in Suburbia describes more than the problems, victories, and happiness of an urban ethnic group moving out to the country. It is the story of a huge change, a change that will rival the Renaissance. Rabbi Gordon's book does justice to Jews, and to suburbia . . . Also a profound contribution to the sociology of the church-state relationship."

Says OSCAR COHEN of the Anti-Defamation League: "Jews in Suburbia is a major contribution to knowledge about present-day Jewish life in America . . . Highly recommended for the individual reader, as well as for use by discussion groups . . . Of great value to scholars . . . Eminently readable . . ."

DAVID GELLER, of the Combined Jewish Appeal, says: "Contains information vital to anyone concerned with Jewish community organization. Professional personnel as well as lay participants in community life will find Jews in Suburbia stimulating, enlightening, and helpful."

THE AUTHOR: Albert I. Gordon has had 30 years' experience in the rabbinate and holds graduate degrees in sociology and anthropology. He is the author of Jews in Transition, former Executive Director of the United Synagogue of America, and an extensive traveler and lecturer; has been a famous labor arbitrator; and is currently Rabbi of Temple Emanuel in Newton, Massachusetts.

Dear Ed:

I was glad to see the Public Affairs Pamphlet based on Selma Hirsh's book. We thought very highly of the book when it was published and distributed some copies of it at that time. I should think that the pamphlet might get good program use.

If you can send us enough copies to circularize our main state people -- anything from a dozen to a hundred -- we can help make its availability known in the South.

Best regards.

Dear Harold:

The enclosed pamphlet -- Fear and Prejudice by Selma Hirsh -- is about to be published by the Public Affairs Committee. It is really a condensation of The Fears Men Live By, by the same author, which in turn was based upon the American Jewish Committee's Studies in Prejudice.

We would have a small quantity available for you, should you have any need for them.

My warm personal regards.

Sincerely,

Dear Ed:

The help you gave me last week was an act of pure friendship, and the Southern Regional Council and I are both grateful.

I will be following up with the Rosenwalds. As I think I told you, I saw both Ben Herzberg and Richard Maas, both of whom indicated that they would help. Mr. Herzberg, in particular, suggested the possibility of arranging substantial aid, along with his associate Mr. Sklar. Herzberg spoke of you in the highest terms, and if the occasion arises I know you can help the matter along invaluably.

It now appears that I will be in New York again around March 27-28-29. Do you think it might be possible at that time for me to talk with Mr. Jack Kaplan or others that I missed out on? As soon as my schedule is final, I will call -- in advance of my coming.

With appreciation and warm regards.

Dear Ed:

The Eldon Edwards interview received no great notice here, though it was carried in Atlanta as well as in many other Southern cities. The people I have talked to (mostly the thoughtful sort) thought Edwards cut an unbelievable figure. I thought so myself and would suspect that he did nothing but add discredit to himself and the Klan among people of any degree of education or sophistication. What effect the interview had on the Klan's constituency is hard to determine. Even among that group, I should think that Edwards did not help himself very much. Wallace so clearly had him off balance that even his followers must have felt that, however unjustly, Edwards got the short end.

I hear that you are going to be in our fair city at the end of the week. I hope that I will have an opportunity to see you then. Meanwhile, best regards.

Even from a bigoted point of view, I don't think he showed up very well as an advocate. We were cheered no end by the generous grant recently approved by the New York Fund for Children. They are giving us $10,000 this year and diminishing amounts for the next two years. I, of course, have written letters of heartfelt thanks to Adel Levy and Marion Ascoli.

This, together with the recently approved grant from the Fund for the Republic, puts us one-third of the way towards our budgetary needs for the coming three years.

I don't have to tell you that I am lastingly grateful for all that you have done to help in a very trying period.

It was good to see you at the AJC dinner recently, and I hope that we will find ourselves together again soon.

Dear Ed:

I have read Mrs. Record's article in the American Scholar with great interest. I think it would have a helpful effect on a substantial audience in the South - namely, those who are receptive to the idea of desegregation but have been disturbed by the constant propaganda linking desegregation with Communist. I don't think it would be helpful in changing the opinions of emotionally committed segregationists. We could reach some hundreds of the kind of people I am talking about, and other agencies such as the church groups could reach more. I dare say there are Northern uses too, but you can assess those better than I can.

Let me know what you decide. If reprint money is a factor, perhaps we could come in for a modest share of the cost.

I am enclosing a couple of items that you might find of passing interest. I trust you will feel appropriately rebuked by the comments of the American Mercury or perhaps, like us, you will feel complimented.

Dear Ed:

Some months ago, SRC commissioned Phil Hammer's agency to do a study of new industries locating in the South during the ten post-war years. Our object was to learn how many plants by size, type, and county had located in the South during this period. We thought that on the basis of this information it would be possible to see more clearly the relationships between industrialization and race relations and thus to focus our interest in that field more sharply.

The study was duly completed and laid the base for two projects in which the N.P.A.'s Committee on Southern Development is deeply interested. One of these has to do with the impact of the new industry generally on the Southern economy, political system and human resources. The other is concerned specifically with a project on the South's manpower needs in the next decade. Obviously, both of these have strong positive implications in terms of racial practices.

We agreed with N.P.A. that if they would properly take on these two projects we would make no public use of the initial findings. The problem, as you would suspect, is the slow pace of which the N.P.A. is moving. We are still holding to our part of the agreement, though our impatience is mounting.

Other than this, our interest in the economic angle has been limited to collecting newspaper reports and other evidence on the interrelationship between racial tension and the economy. I believe Harry Fleischman has everything we have to date on this.

I am strongly convinced that if we can figure out how to get hold of it there is important leverage in this area. Please share with me any ideas which may occur to you, and I will do likewise.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Dear Harold:

Thanks for your letter of June 18, to which I did not respond earlier because I had not formulated a plan, until today, concerning the use to which we would want to put the Record article in The American Scholar.

We are making use of it in the following fashion:

1. We are trying to induce the United Church Women, or some other such group, to attach their imprimatur to a reprint of the article itself, for strategic distribution in the South, keeping in mind your own suggestion that perhaps it should be targeted at those Southerners who, though receptive to the idea of desegregation, are disturbed by the "Communist" label.

2. As a result of a shameful linking by Cong. Abernethy of Miss. of desegregation and Communism (tinged somewhat by some rather anti-Semitic references to an alleged Communist named Israel Cohen), we are arranging for the insertion of The American Scholar piece into the Congressional Record some time next week, hopefully. We are then planning to order several thousand copies of the Congressional Record insert, and will make them available to the CCD agencies.

If and when both of these plans are executed, you might want to indicate to us how many of each version you would want. Harry Fleischman will be in touch with you at the approprate time.

I read with interest the items you sent to me. The American Mercury is rapidly deteriorating into a vicious anti-Negro and anti-Semitic journal. I must say that the transition from Menken to Maguire (the Mercury's present publisher) has been both eventful and shameful.

My warm regards.

Sincerely,

Edwin J. Lukas

I can well imagine how impatient you must be with NPA; I don't recall when I have last had an experience as exasperating as the one through which we are still struggling.

The only suggestion I have to offer is that you deal with the individual members of NPA's Committee on Southern Development; in any event, in connection with our own project, that is privately what we are undertaking to do, in order to move NPA more quickly along the road toward action of some kind. Call Morris

August 29, 1957

Mr. Morris B. Abram
Healey Building
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Morris:

I have just read a remarkable piece by Lillian Smith, which appears in the August 26th issue of The New Leader. A copy of that issue is enclosed herewith (see page 12). As you see, it echoes the theme that you have developed, namely, that so long as the leadership in the South is seized by irresponsible groups, to the exclusion of competition from the civic and spiritual leaders, a species of mob rule will continue to prevail. I believe the Smith piece is a forthright and eloquent plea to the thoughtful citizens of the South who formerly occupied prominent positions of leadership in many areas of Southern life but who, in the current situation, have forfeited their positions.

Would you regard it as profitable to have reprints of the Smith article made and distributed strategically to carefully selected people in the South (especially the deep South)? Involved in such a decision, naturally, is the problem of Lillian Smith's current standing among thoughtful citizens in the South today, as well as the fact that the article is carried by The New Leader, an avowedly liberal, New York-based journal.

All these things considered, I would appreciate your advice. I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to Harold Fleming, Seymour Samet, and Samuel Lubin, inviting their reactions as well.

I trust all goes well with you. My best to Jane and to yourself.

BETWEEN ISSUES

A NEW LEADER article played a major role in the recent Congressional struggle over civil rights legislation. The article was "Jury Trials and Civil Rights: A New Proposal," by Carl A. Auerbach, which appeared with little fanfare in our April 29 issue.

As far as we can tell, this was the first article to urge Federal use of civil-contempt proceedings to protect civil rights. Noting the split among liberals on jury trials for criminal contempt, Mr. Auerbach, who is professor of law at the University of Wisconsin, argued that the split was unnecessary, that the broad use of civil-contempt actions (as in the John L. Lewis case a decade ago and others) would permit significant enforcement of voting rights. In a civil-contempt proceeding, a registrar or other official denying the right to vote could be jailed by a judge without jury trial—but could end the sentence himself by complying with the court's order. Flexible use by the Attorney General of the power to bring civil proceedings would, Professor Auerbach argued, induce compliance in many cases.

When the civil-rights bill reached the Senate a few weeks later, Hubert H. Humphrey, Minnesota Democrat, quickly wrote Professor Auerbach for 100 copies of his article, which were soon distributed and discussed. Meanwhile, a group of experienced legislative draftsmen including NEW LEADER contributor Benjamin A. Cohen were working on an amendment which would distinguish civil-contempt from criminal-contempt actions. This effort bore fruit in the O'Mahoney-Kefauver-Church amendment, which guaranteed a jury trial for criminal-contempt actions (thus mollifying a number of eminent civil libertarians as well as Southern and many Western Democrats) but provided the Attorney General with broad and flexible powers to obtain injunctions which, if defied, could lead to imprisonment or fines for civil contempt.

On July 29, Senator Frank Church, Idaho Democrat and one of the co-sponsors of this amendment, inserted Professor Auerbach's article in the Congressional Record, declaring that its recommendations were essentially those embodied in the amendment. On Wednesday, August 7, Senator Church again said on the floor of the Senate that the article "contributed to the genesis of the jury-trial amendment" which was finally passed by the Senate.

Meanwhile, however, the Senate had struck out Part III of the bill after President Eisenhower had expressed doubts about its meaning and validity at a press conference. This section would have given the Attorney General the power to use the civil-contempt proceeding in all denials of civil rights—not just restriction of the right to vote, but maintenance of segregation in public schools and other facilities. "The tragedy of the civil-rights fight," writes Professor Auerbach from Madison, "is not the jury-trial amendment to Part IV of the bill, but Eisenhower's scuttling of Part III."

One other item should be mentioned in this account of THE NEW LEADER in Washington. In our August 5 issue, Tris Coffin described how Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson had engineered the various compromises which permitted the final bill to pass the Senate without a filibuster. On August 6, Senator Johnson wrote Coffin: "I want to thank you for making it clear to the readers of THE NEW LEADER that I wanted a bill and wanted a record for constructive legislation. Whatever 'genius for persuasion' I may have will be exercised toward securing a significant bill, and I am glad to know that you understand that."

The Teamsters and Labor's Future

JIMMY HOFFA, the redoubtable ninth vice-president of the Teamsters Union, having been cleared by a jury in the Federal Court of a charge of bribery, immediately announced his candidacy for the office of president of the Teamsters, vacated by the venal Dave Beck. It becomes increasingly apparent that, practically unopposed, he will be the next head of this great union. Hoffa has a long record of partnership with gangsters, including the nefarious Johnny Dio. He is undoubtedly abler and even more ambitious than Dave Beck. He has a tremendous itch for power which probably dominates his not inconsiderable greed. Thus his character is similar to Beck's except that power rather than self is first in his hierarchy of values. He is more "honest" than Beck only in the sense that he will steal for the union but not from the union.

That such a man should have such bright prospects of heading a great union, so recently humiliated by the Beck exposures, proves that the union is suffering from a deeper corruption than the unique moral defections of Beck. It also reveals that trade unionism as a whole, despite the laudable efforts of George Meany, Jim Carey, Walter Reuther and Dave Dubinsky to eliminate corruption as they previously eliminated Communism, faces a more fundamental problem than the low standards of morals in some unions, the Teamsters being the most conspicuous example.

In analyzing this problem, we ought to establish two basic presuppositions in regard to the life of trade unionism in our technical culture. The first is that the organized power of labor has done more to increase the health of both our economic and political life than any other factor. It has provided that equilibrium of power without which justice is unattainable. It set organized power against organized power, which is the prerequisite of justice in a highly organized technical society.

The necessity of trade-union power in the economy of justice makes the weakening of the unions, as is intended by the "right to work" laws adopted or pending in many state legislatures, dangerous to the health of our country. Significantly, these laws are proposed not in the Congress but in the states, many of the legislatures of which have built-in conservative majorities in which the countryside has constitutional advantages over the great urban centers.

In these legislatures, the anachronistic individualism of local business leaders, who have not come to terms with the social facts of modern society, can find alliance with the individualism of the farmers, to whom the collective pressures and counter-pressures of industrial society are mysterious and dangerous mechanisms. But this kind of individualism is too anachronistic and too tendentious to prevail in the nation as a whole. The more mature portions of the nation, of whatever economic class or interest, have accepted the realities of both big business and big labor as ineluctable facts of our economy and our democracy.

But this brings us to the second basic presupposition in dealing with the problems made vivid by the Teamsters' low standards. That presupposition is that both big business and big labor have acquired semi-governmental functions. They must, therefore, conform to the moral and political standards of our political system or our whole system is imperiled.

We have outgrown the old liberal society in which government supposedly was the only power and it dealt with individuals. This theory was partly based on illusion. Even in Adam Smith's day the big corporation loomed, and Smith rightly suspected that it did not conform to his picture of a self-regulating market economy of fairly matched individual enterprises. A century of history has passed, and the subordinate sovereignties of business and labor have grown. If labor had not grown to become a fairly even match with big business, the injustices of early industrialism, which gave the Marxist creed such a plausibility in the latter part of the 19th century, would have also made for the realization of the gloomy Marxist prophecies of catastrophe. The Western democracies righted their imbalances and regained new health by many strategies of justice. Of these, the rise of the labor movement was the most important.

Significantly, our own nation did not catch up with the general standards of Western democracy until a quarter century ago. Arthur Schlesinger Jr. points out, in his first volume on the "Age of Roosevelt," that FDR was not fully conscious of the importance of the Wagner National Labor Relations Act. But he supported it, and the boost which this act gave to the organization of labor may have been more important than any New Deal achievement.

In short, the two great giants are fairly evenly balanced. That solves the over-all problem of justice; but it does not solve the subordinate problem of assuring justice in these subordinate centers of authority which have, in Hobbes's phrase, acquired "chips of the block of sovereignty." Let us put aside, for the moment, the problem of the giant corporation with its combination of prestige and power, its right to hire and fire, which certainly makes big business a part of government. The problem of the big corporation is too great to be solved merely by the enforcement of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the Clayton Act. But it is not the problem which concerns us here. The problem is "big labor," which has become a sovereignty so great that, with big business, our society has features which are as similar to the old feudalism as they are to the old liberalism.

James Hoffa and Dave Beck have moral and political standards which remind us of what we should not have forgotten: that is, that the original passion for justice among leaders of a group which was defrauded of justice does not guarantee their probity in the use of the power which they have acquired in the struggle for justice. It is significant that Beck and Hoffa have used their original services to what were then "poor" teamsters as a source of prestige and, therefore, power, much as the Communist leaders in Russia used the memory of imprisonment in Siberia as the source of their prestige. In neither case did this guarantee the right use of their power. In both cases extreme partisanship is one of the causes of moral decay.

The Teamsters seemed not to be bothered by Hoffa's standards any more than they were by Beck's, and they regard Hoffa as superior to Beck because he did not steal from the widow of a labor friend, which was obviously Beck's crowning offense in the Teamster moral code. Until that disclosure, he thought he could brave it out. Whenever this kind of partisanship dominates a group, we approach the standards of Communism, no matter how explicitly the creed of Communism is disavowed. There is no cure for this partisanship, except perhaps that the same relaxation of heroic polemics which brought about the moral decay will also bring about a relaxation of the partisanship, and persuade the Teamsters to judge their leaders by the general standards of the society of which they are a part. "My country, right or wrong" is always an amoral principle whether applied to nations, classes or unions.

We cannot merely rely on the general relaxation of the mood of partisanship, just as labor was wrong in relying too much upon the mood of "idealism" which had presumably actuated the first exertions of labor leaders in the hazardous days of organization but did not guarantee their probity in the easier days of power. Incidentally, it may be significant that of the most respected union leaders today many have been trained in the school of an idealistic 19th-century socialism—Walter Reuther and David Dubinsky, for instance.

But the exercise of power requires more than the inner restraints of a social tradition or a moral mood. It requires constitutional restraints. The liberal devotion to labor ought not to obscure the fact that even the best unions are defective in the constitutional safeguards against the misuse of power. They have no independent judiciary for one thing, no court to which a member may appeal which is completely independent of the current union leadership.

A more important defect is that there is no separation of powers. In theory, the only legislative power rests in the annual convention. There is no representative legislature. But an even more significant defect is that in many unions the executive committee is composed of members who are dependent for their own positions upon the president of the union. There is, in short, no balance of power in many unions. The late J. B. S. Hardman, who made this problem a life-long concern, reported how in the days of the late Sidney Hillman his proposal to make an alliance with the Communists in the now defunct American Labor party, though Communists were rigorously excluded in his own union, was secretly opposed but openly supported by many members of the union oligarchy who did not dare show open opposition.

The problem of any democracy is how to make the oligarchy responsible to the democracy. For, contrary to the old liberal theory, democracies must and do have oligarchies which wield actual power and whose power must be made responsible. In the case of the Teamsters, we do not know what the members think of Hoffa. We only know that a powerful portion of the oligarchy has declared for him and that, consequently, his election is almost a foregone conclusion.

The enemies of labor will try to make the Teamsters' picture appear typical for unionism as a whole, and that would obscure the virtues, the honesty and the devotion to the general welfare which characterize union leadership as a whole. But the friends of labor cannot deny that the trade-union movement faces a more general problem than the venality of particular leaders when the Federation, under George Meany's leadership, failed to win over the corrupt Longshoremen's union which it had ousted but which was still able to win elections against the Federation-sponsored union. It may even face the defiance of a Hoffa who not only promises to take over the Teamsters but to make industrial union raids upon the old craft unions and thus enlarge his dominion either inside or outside the Federation.

One additional problem of union democracy must be mentioned, which cannot be solved by a constitutional separation of powers. It is a problem created by the peculiar conditions of union democracy. It is the problem of "one-party" government. This problem is created by the fact that the means of communication in a union are all controlled by the official leadership of the union. There is no room for a "loyal opposition" because there is no economic base for an opposition press. Unions are not totalitarian in intent; but they approach the totalitarian status because of the peculiar difficulties in organizing parties which will appeal to the general membership rather than to a section of the oligarchy. This matter is important, because in Western democracy many nations have not benefited from the explicit "separation of powers" of our Constitution. But no democracy has maintained its vitality if only one party could function and if the wielders of power were not under the constant scrutiny of an alternative government.

I am not wise enough to suggest even a tentative answer to these problems. But I think I know enough, as an outside but friendly observer of trade unionism, to say that they are problems which must be solved before one of the great subordinate sovereignties of modern life can approach the standards of the ultimate sovereignty in our scheme of government. It is worth observing that the constitutional safeguards in the trade-union movement are not strong enough to have guaranteed the relative probity of the leadership which the unions have enjoyed. Inner restraints must have operated in maintaining these relatively high standards. But ultimately all government, including the sub-government of business and labor, cannot rely too much on human nature. It must guard against the abuse of power by proper checks and balances. The Dave Becks, Jimmy Hoffas and their like may have performed a negative function in proving that the labor movement may have to re-examine its constitutional checks upon human nature.

GERMAN ELECTION FUNDS

By F. R. Allemann

Adenauer's party has more than all others combined

BONN

ACCORDING to Article 21 of West Germany's Basic Law, political parties "must publicly account for the source of their funds." However, Paragraph 3 of this article states simply: "Further details are regulated by Federal laws." These laws have not yet made their appearance, nor are they likely to so long as the present Government coalition remains in power. For the parties which back Chancellor Konrad Adenauer are not in the least interested in transforming this legal requirement into reality. Their financing is the most obscure of all the German parties.

It is scarcely an exaggeration to set the total cost of the current Bundestag election campaign at a minimum of 50 million marks ($12.5 million)—probably more when one considers not only the immediate expenses for posters, leaflets, films, automobiles, meetings halls, etc., but also the personnel required to maintain the campaign from headquarters in Bonn down to the local election districts. One should also include the various indirect services available to the parties, e.g., the well-endowed Government publicity apparatus, which in effect makes propaganda for the Adenauer forces, and the efforts of certain ostensibly non-party groups, such as the apparently affluent "Working Association of Democratic Circles," a vote-getting instrument for the coalition.

The monetary value of such services cannot be estimated. But the 50 million marks cited above is itself a huge sum, and the collections made at election rallies make up less than a tenth of it. What about the rest? Who really supplies the funds, and how much is available to the various parties?

Financing methods and sources—direct and indirect—differ from one party to another. The problem is least complicated in the case of the Social Democratic party (SPD). With its more than 600,000 dues-paying members (compared with the 250,000 of Adenauer's Christian Democratic Union), who are assessed according to income, the SPD boasts a solid organizational foundation, which makes it largely independent of outside aid. Another source of strength is the volunteer party election workers, who distribute leaflets, paste up stickers, guard meetings, etc. without pay. The Government parties are forced to pay for similar services. For these reasons, the SPD not only can afford to be remarkably frank at party congresses about the sources, extent and use of its funds; it can also count on achieving more, mark for mark, than its opponents with their vastly greater resources.

This difference is noticeable—to cite one small example—even at the party congresses. The SPD ushers are ordinary party members, ranging from blue-uniformed "falcons" of the Socialist Workers' Youth to gray-haired party veterans. The CDU and Free Democratic party (FDP), on the other hand, employ the paid services of students—or even, as at the CDU's Stuttgart congress, attractive dress models.

Yet, the SPD, too, has various circuitous ways of helping to finance its campaign. To be sure, it receives no direct contributions from the labor unions, which are pledged to nonpartisanship by their constitutions. But the unions, for example, own large printing plants. When the latter print Social Democratic campaign material at very favorable prices, with long-term payments, it is just as effective as a cash contribution. Another source of aid is loans on easy terms by union-controlled finance companies.

As a result of all this, the SPD will have an election fund estimated at 5 million marks. The Government parties, particularly the Christian Democrats, have far greater funds, though the assertion that industrial and financial interests have placed 100 million marks at their disposal is surely an exaggeration. They are almost completely dependent on wealthy backers, mobilized by the public-relations groups maintained by various big-business associations.

According to well-informed sources, Adenauer's CDU has some 30 million marks available for the campaign—more than all the other parties together. The German party (DP), Adenauer's small but faithful coalition partner, has received 6-7 million as its share of the kitty—a huge amount for a party which in 1953 received less than 900,000 votes. The DP owes its current prosperity chiefly to the experienced politicians with strong business backing who joined its ranks after deserting the Free Democrats early in 1956 when the latter pulled out of the Adenauer Government. The big industrial associations are clearly supporting the DP in order to strengthen the right wing of the Government coalition.

For several months after their withdrawal from the Government, the Free Democrats were cut off from all industry funds. They are still viewed with suspicion, but their passionate defense of free enterprise and propaganda against socialism have been rewarded with some 3 million marks. The FDP has, moreover, created its own circle of patrons in small and medium industry (especially in the Ruhr).

Even the Refugee party (BHE), whose election prospects are dim at best, has received nearly 1.5 million marks from business benefactors. This probably explains why the BHE, which two years ago joined the opposition to Adenauer, has recently been steering more of a pro-Government course. The BHE is the only party that can compete with the Social Democrats in tight organization, its 200,000 members compare favorably with the CDU's 250,000, and it receives political aid from the powerful "Association of German Expellees," which is nominally nonpartisan but inevitably works closely with the BHE.

When one adds these various sums of money, one arrives at a total of 40 million marks pumped into the treasuries of the "bourgeois" parties by industrial firms and associations. The parties that benefit from this largess have devised an effective means of encouraging continued generosity: Under the recent tax reform, contributions to "civic" causes (which specifically includes political parties) are exempt from both income and corporation taxes. Thus, contributions have been even heavier this year than in 1953.

The Socialist-led Hessian State Government, encouraged by a recent decision of the Federal Constitutional Court, has launched an effort to deprive the SPD's political foes of this powerful weapon. In a complaint to the Constitutional Court, it has challenged the constitutionality of the tax-deduction provision. Should this move succeed, which seems somewhat dubious, the munificent West German captains of industry will have to pay up their back taxes. A judicial decision will be rendered after the elections.

Serious concern has been expressed about this whole system. This concern has, indeed, found expression in the provisions of the Constitution, which declares the financial behavior of political parties to be a public matter. Thus far, however, this has remained no more than a pious wish, blatantly ignored by the forces that dominate political life in West Germany.

TERMINAL

I met a traveler from Suburbia
Who said: "Today,
Coming back to work from my vacation,
I saw a monster at the station:
A ballistic missile on display.

"Perhaps the men who chose to put it there
Had hoped I might—
Standing in its shadow for a minute—
Feel some pride or pleasure in it:
I was horror-stricken at the sight.

"And quickly heading for the nearest door
I went outside,
Looking eastward toward the sun at Forty-second
And the river as I reckoned:
Man or missile—which will be the guide?"

The Surprise of the 20th Congress

FROM THE TIME Nikita Khrushchev re-entered the Secretariat of the Soviet Communist party after Stalin's death, he waged a formidable struggle against numerous powerful adversaries. In July 1953, he helped bring about the fall of Lavrenti Beria; in February 1955, he succeeded in ousting Georgi Malenkov from the Premiership; at the Central Committee's plenary meeting in July 1955, he scored a decisive victory over Vyacheslav Molotov on the question of relations with Tito. Yet all these activities were only preliminary to the grand offensive launched by Khrushchev in the fall of 1955.

First, Khrushchev advanced the scheduling of the 20th Party Congress, moving it up from October 1956 to February 1956, and at the same time dismissed the old Central Committee plenum, which had been chosen under Malenkov's aegis. Then he began energetically to pack the forthcoming congress.

In the Ukraine, some 20 per cent of the secretaries of Party cells were removed in the months before the Congress; and the Ukraine, which for nearly two decades has been virtually Khrushchev's special patrimony, was by no means hardest hit. In the Uzbek Republic, for example, the percentage of dismissals was 36. For the whole country, the dismissals probably amounted to 25 per cent—which means that, of a total of more than 300,000 Party cells, some 75,000 saw their secretaries removed.

The shake-up was even more drastic in higher Party organizations. In a number of provinces, the dismissals of regional-committee secretaries reached 100 per cent—the entire leadership was changed. Only with the first secretaries of provincial and territorial committees was Khrushchev somewhat more cautious, for they were all either members or candidate-members of the Central Committee. Yet, even among them there were quite a few dismissals, including the first secretaries of the provincial committees of Gorki, Sverdlovsk and Saratov.

This shake-up not only eliminated those who were not completely reliable in the eyes of Khrushchev and his aides. It also raised en masse in the Party hierarchy a large group of new people who based their hopes of a career on Khrushchev. Of a total of 1,356 voting delegates at the 20th Congress, some 500, or 37 per cent, owed their advancement to Khrushchev.

This organizational shake-up of the Party apparatus (directed by Averki B. Aristov of the Secretariat's cadre section) was linked with an ideological "tightening up" directed by Pyotr N. Pospelov, Central Committee secretary for agit-prop. One sign of this "tightening up" was the policy of rehabilitating Stalin.

After Beria's April 1953 report to the Central Committee, Stalin's name had virtually disappeared from the Soviet press. This went so far that in the May 1953 issue of the magazine Smena, a work by the poet Lugovsky which glorified Stalin had been blacked out and replaced by a revised version which made no mention of him. Systematic rehabilitation of Stalin started immediately after the July 1955 plenum, forming part of Khrushchev's preparations for the 20th Congress.

This policy of the Khrushchev-dominated Secretariat becomes clear if we compare the reaction of the Soviet press to Stalin's birthday in 1955 with that in 1954. The latter was a jubilee year—the 75th anniversary of Stalin's birth—and yet not one of the major newspapers marked it in any way. 1955 was not a jubilee year, but all Soviet organs marked the anniversary with prominent articles. Stalin's name was blazoned across the entire press, and a slogan describing the Soviet Communist party as "the Party of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin" was widely displayed.

In January 1956, too, it was announced in the Literary Gazette that the 14th volume of Stalin's collected works would shortly be published. This volume was to include articles for the years 1934-39—the period of the Yezhovshchina, when several million people were wiped out, including some 500,000 Party members and three-quarters of the Central Committee. The volume had been ready for publication while Stalin was still alive, but it had been held up on the latter's orders, obviously because the "father of peoples" might strike the reader as a little too bloodthirsty in its pages. Pospelov, who had joined the editorial staff preparing the Works, saw no need to pay any attention to this.

Although the 20th Party Congress was carefully prepared both organizationally and ideologically, to a considerable degree Khrushchev's hopes for complete victory were dashed. Khrushchev banked primarily in his ideological work on returning to the traditions of consistent Stalinism. Yet, in the interests of his struggle against Malenkov, he had staged the trial of Deputy State Security Chief Abakumov, thus opening up one of the many pages of the book of Stalinist terror. True, he tried to load all the responsibility onto Beria, but when, in theaters throughout the Soviet Union, the heroes of Alexander Korneichuk's play Wings proclaimed their indictment of the organizers of merciless repression, everyone understood that not just Beria was involved. Against this background, the articles lauding Stalin could not but produce revulsion among Soviet readers, including Party workers.

Another contradiction was evident in Khrushchev's policy toward the satellites. In his struggle against Molotov, Khrushchev had attacked the activity of Soviet diplomats—for whom Molotov bore official responsibility—in the satellites, but said nothing about the even worse behavior of representatives of the Soviet Army, police and Party. Such speeches, insofar as they became known in the satellite parties, hurt not just Molotov but the Soviet regime as a whole. In his speeches before Party meetings in Warsaw in 1955, Khrushchev had denounced "national Communist" sentiments in Poland, but his fight against Molotov provided the "national Communists" with new ammunition.

The 20th Party Congress, the first since Stalin, could not but hold the center of attention among Communists throughout the world. Formally, it followed the program Khrushchev had laid out; the main events were his report on the activity of the Central Committee and Bulganin's on the new Five-Year Plan. These reports were adopted by a solid majority. But this external discipline at the Congress by no means reflected what was happening behind the scenes. Early in 1954, A. A. Andreyev, chairman of the Party Control Commission, had launched an investigation of the bloody repression of the Stalin era. When Andreyev was elected chairman of a similar commission under the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, his investigation had become both a Party and a Government affair. As early as the summer of 1954, the press began to announce the presentation of awards to "old Bolsheviks" who had vanished without a trace 15 or more years before.

After creation of the commission under the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, the number of purge victims returning to their families rose rapidly. This type of character—the man who nearly two decades earlier had fallen victim to false denunciations and was punished for no just cause—has now appeared in Soviet literature, showing us the tremendous effect the returnees' accounts have had on the Soviet public.

Many threads from this terrible past led to the 20th Congress. From I. Boitsov's article in the magazine Kommunist (No. 8, 1956) we know that the Congress received statements from an enormous number of purged Communists, disclosing the treatment they had received and requesting a review of their cases. Even more important, a wave of similar statements arrived from the "fraternal parties" in the satellites, especially from Poland and Hungary. The leaders of these parties, forced to flee from persecution at home to the Soviet Union, were there mercilessly annihilated during the Yezhovshchina. The 20th Congress was attended by large delegations from the satellite parties, and they all brought demands for rehabilitation of those who had been liquidated and liberation of those who survived.

It was impossible not to take these demands into consideration. By February 17-19, the very first days of the Congress, statements were appearing in the press showing that the dead Polish and Hungarian Communists had already been rehabilitated. Once the foreign victims of the Yezhovshchina had been rehabilitated, there was no way of avoiding rehabilitation of the Soviet victims—particularly since the Andreyev commissions had already prepared lengthy reports, the Presidium was already familiar with them, and rumors about their existence were beginning to circulate among the Congress delegates. The question was raised of hearing Andreyev's report at a closed session of the Congress. This demand was hinted at in the speeches of some Presidium members, notably Anastas Mikoyan.

In these circumstances, only a Stalinist idealist, ready to jeopardize his whole career in order to defend the honor of his mentor, could continue to glorify the dead dictator. Khrushchev had no desire to play the gallant knight, perishing in defense of his father's honor. Hence, at the very last minute, he decided to change course—probably after becoming convinced that otherwise the report would be read by Andreyev, who would have presented quite a different picture.

Making use of the material gathered by Andreyev's commissions, Khrushchev not only unscrupulously doctored it in his "secret report," but utilized it to settle scores with his own foes in the Presidium. Khrushchev managed in one way or another to imply complicity in the worst of Stalin's crimes on the part of all those Presidium members who are now, in 1957, included in the "anti-Party group." Naturally, all of them—Molotov, Kaganovich and Molotov alike—bear considerable responsibility for the Stalinist crimes. But an equal measure of responsibility lies with Khrushchev himself and his present allies, whom he depicted not as Stalin's accomplices but as people who themselves escaped falling victim to Stalin only by a miracle.

The report also contained a good many concealed attempts to defend Stalin, whose well-thought-out, skilful campaigns to destroy his political foes were portrayed by Khrushchev as the actions of a sick man, suffering from a persecution complex. Essentially, the report contained the necessary basis for a future defense of Stalin as a mentally ill man who fell under the influence of various political scoundrels from some "anti-Party group." At any rate, it provided no material for a principled critique of Stalinism as an evil, socially dangerous system.

Khrushchev's report, though its picture of Stalin's crimes was not even remotely coherent in a political sense, was nevertheless filled with colorful incidents which made a powerful impression on the 1,300-odd delegates. It made an even greater impression on rank-and-file Party members, to whom, by decision of the Congress, the content of the report was systematically made known; and greater yet abroad, where news of the report, and then its text, quickly made its way. Many people, on the basis of the "secret report," proclaimed Khrushchev as the leader of the anti-Stalinist wing in the Kremlin, forgetting all his activities until the very eve of the Congress.

This was exactly what Khrushchev wanted in the extremely difficult situation which had arisen. For he had gone into the Congress intending to settle scores with all his opponents, but the situation had proved unfavorable. A number of the speeches at the Congress contained anti-Khrushchev notes. Especially interesting was the speech by the crafty Mikoyan—a kind of warning to Khrushchev not to attempt to defend Stalin, lest the whole story of the Yezhovshchina in the Ukraine, for which Khrushchev was largely responsible, be publicized.

MIKOYAN: A CRAFTY WARNING

After the 20th Congress, a wave of anti-Stalinist sentiment rolled over both the Soviet Union and the satellites. Broad sections of the population and rank-and-file Party members gave Khrushchev credit for this development. But Khrushchev's attitude in no sense corresponded to the legends which formed about his role. Almost immediately after the Congress, his apparatus launched a struggle against those press organs and writers who tried to put anti-Stalinist sentiment on a solid foundation. His chief instrument was Partiinaya Zhizn ("Party Life"), organ of the Secretariat, whose editors had been selected by Pospelov. This journal launched the campaign against Voprosy Istorii ("Problems of History") for its attempts to start accurately portraying Stalin's role in the Bolshevik movement and the Revolution. The campaign ended with the removal of the entire editorial staff of Voprosy Istorii. Ye. Bugayev, the contributor to Partiinaya Zhizn who launched its fight against Voprosy Istorii, has recently been named editor-in-chief of a new magazine, Voprosy Istorii KPSS ("Problems of the History of the CPSU"), which is to become the authoritative official source on the history of the Communist movement.

In preceding years, Khrushchev had opposed every attempt to clear the way for free inquiry in literature, science and art. On his instructions in 1954, a campaign was launched against Pomerantsev, Shcheglov and other writers for the magazine Novy Mir ("New World"), who had preached "sincerity" in literature. The campaign ended with the removal as editor-in-chief of Alexander Tvardovsky, who had been linked with Malenkov since his student days.

On Khrushchev's instructions, too, new campaigns have more recently been organized against "revisionists" in literature and science, against Voprosy Istorii, against Voprosy Filosofii ("Problems of Philosophy"), against Literaturnaya Moskva ("Literary Moscow"), against Konstantin Simonov and Novy Mir, etc. [See "The Revolt of the Moscow Writers," page 18.] To Khrushchev, as Party First Secretary, lead the threads of all the slanderous campaigns being conducted in Literaturnaya Gazeta ("Literary Gazette") and Pravda against authors who show the slightest independence. In post-Stalinist Russia, there has been only one center of stubborn resistance to cultural de-Stalinization—the Central Committee Secretariat, headed by Khrushchev.

Khrushchev's role is essentially the same in regard to the satellites. Since 1953, several attempts have been made to ease the latter's position. Seweryn Bialer, who observed these events as a well-informed Polish Communist, wrote in the July 29 NEW LEADER that Malenkov's policy was the most liberal toward the satellites. Malenkov picked Imre Nagy to be Premier of Hungary in July 1953, and Nagy was removed shortly after Malenkov's deposition. When the whole policy of "thaw" was liquidated in Hungary, the Central Committee Secretariat, i.e., Khrushchev, circulated a special letter among Communist organizations, arguing that the policy which Nagy had pursued with Malenkov's support had been dangerous to the satellites and to the Soviet Union. Nagy's fall was followed by the return of Matyas Rakosi and Erno Gerö, who had been responsible for the worst acts of terror in Communist Hungary.

Furthermore, the United Nations report on the Hungarian Revolution has established that the outbreak of violence in Budapest was the result of deliberate provocation. As early as October 21-22, i.e., before the beginning of the student demonstrations, Soviet troops in Hungary were placed in a state of battle readiness. Gerö and the Stalinists in Moscow who backed him were preparing a bloodbath for all the Hungarian anti-Stalinist groups, the "revisionist" Communists as well as the non-Party intelligentsia. A similar plot was being prepared in Warsaw. Edward Ochab, then First Secretary of the Polish Communist party, has reported that several days before the critical events of October 19-23 he was approached by Marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky with the proposal to stage a putsch in Poland.

Rokossovsky would take such a step only on Moscow's orders.

Who were the Moscow Stalinists who could give orders to the Soviet commanders in both Hungary and Poland? Only Khrushchev or someone acting for him could have done this. To be sure, during the fall of 1956 opposition to Khrushchev in the Presidium was great, but none of the leaders of this opposition had any connection with the executive organs either of the Party (the Secretariat) or of the Government. Khrushchev controlled the executive authority in both. Instructions from Moscow to organize coups in Hungary and Poland could emanate only from these executive organs.

This is confirmed by our information about the negotiations conducted by Khrushchev and other delegates of the Presidium with the Polish Communist leaders. This delegation, which flew into Warsaw on October 19, consisted of Khrushchev, Mikoyan and two "oppositionists," Molotov and Kaganovich. The make-up of the delegation reflected the Presidium's unwillingness to let Khrushchev act on his own authority. We know that at these negotiations the most irreconcilable was Khrushchev. It was he who would not agree to Gomulka's return as First Secretary and who tried to deliver an ultimatum about Rokossovsky, whose recall was demanded by the Polish Communists. Only the efforts of the other three members of the Moscow delegation averted an open break; and there is no doubt that it was the pressure of a majority of the Presidium that forced Khrushchev, after his return to Moscow, to telephone Gomulka and apologize.

The die-hard Stalinists who opposed every attempt at de-Stalinization in the Soviet Union and the satellites were, above all, the group around Khrushchev. It was this group that resorted to provocation in order to check the successes of the "revisionists" in Hungary and Poland.

MEXICO CITY AFTER THE QUAKE

By Victor Alba

MEXICO CITY

A LADY I KNOW described the July 27 earthquake here—the most severe in modern times—in the following words:

"I woke up with a feeling of nausea and heartburn, and I thought, 'Good God, I'm pregnant again.'"

An American student wrote to her family that "the trees were dancing the cha-cha."

In actual fact, the people of Mexico City are so accustomed to seeing quakes neutralized by the spongy subsoil on which this capital is built that they were not particularly alarmed. True, there were a good many broken dishes and windowpanes, and cases of beds sliding across the room. But it was not until the following morning, upon reading the newspapers, that the people realized that they had lived through a serious earthquake which would have caused a catastrophe had the city been built on firm ground. As a result of the tremor, several modern buildings were left temporarily uninhabitable and another collapsed, with the loss of some 30 lives. The Independence Monument lost its "angel," which toppled over and was decapitated in the process.

Mexico City rests on a porous subsoil, and water had to be pumped out before any building was possible. The result is that the land is sinking at the rate of a foot-and-a-half annually. The streets are uneven, and when a new building is put up the smaller structures alongside it tend to rise and develop cracks under the pressure. Certain buildings, such as the Palace of Fine Arts—a ghastly marble-and-bronze monstrosity from the beginning of this century—have sunk so far that half of the first floor is below ground level.

The subsoil problem and the constant expansion and population growth of the city (from 500,000 in 1910 to 4 million in 1957) have forced architects and engineers to seek new solutions. Some are trying to halt the settling of existing buildings by pumping water into the subsoil, while others are looking for methods of preventing new construction from sinking.

Recently, some skyscrapers have been constructed on enormous hydraulic jacks which raise or lower them in accordance with the ground level. When there is an earthquake, the building rocks to and fro, but without collapsing or cracking. Buildings like the new Torre de la Latino-Americana and the National Lottery (a monument in stone to the importance of gambling in Mexican life) survived the recent quake intact, while others, not built on jacks, cracked from top to bottom and will have to be torn down.

The earthquake has also raised some interesting questions in another field. For the past several decades, Mexico City has been the victim of a colossal artistic fraud. A group of artists, chiefly painters, have dominated the market and imposed their point of view. They have promoted the careers of mediocre artists who could pose no threat to their own position, and condemned to silence, neglect and loneliness those talented people who refused to submit to their sterile standards.

With the passage of years and the saturation of the market by their works, this monopolistic group has lost ground. In order to recoup, they have had to resort to various tricks in the search for new material. They have taken to speaking about "plastic integration" and mingling sculpture and painting in the same work of art —a procedure that would be permissible in expressing something which required this fusion but instead has served to lend an appearance of novelty to utterly banal works.

This movement has also gained control of architecture. By definition, an architect is supposed to concern himself above all with the safety of the structures he is erecting. Mexican architects, however, have in recent years been adorning the fronts of buildings with mosaics, cement slabs, etc.—an application to their field of so-called "plastic integration." The result: After the earthquake, the streets of this city were littered with the debris of these ornaments. Had the quake hit during the daytime, when the streets were filled with people, the casualties inflicted by "plastic integration" would have been considerable.

One striking aspect of the earthquake was the difference in behavior between the wealthy classes—including American tourists—and the poor. The latter, as always in such cases, went out in the street. They did so not to protect themselves but to pray and to submit to what the deeply religious Mexican lower classes call the "will of God"—which, in reality, means to them the will of vast forces which they cannot comprehend. The rich, on the other hand, remained indoors in an effort to protect themselves. The tourists, for example, stayed in their hotel corridors, sleeping on sofas and armchairs, during the three nights following the tremor. The difference was significant. To the average impoverished Mexican, life obviously seemed a far less valuable possession than to the relatively limited class of the well-to-do.

All in all, if the Mexican earthquake was not a material catastrophe, it was a spiritual catastrophe for those who pondered its lessons. The inadequate safety precautions and the artistic charlatanism which it revealed are discouraging evidence that human wisdom does not keep pace with technological progress. Indeed, even the use of hydraulic jacks in tall buildings was due to economic considerations (the rise in the price of land caused a trend to skyscrapers, which could not be built unless the problem of land settling was solved) and not to a desire to minimize earthquake damage.

The basic need here, as perhaps in contemporary civilization as a whole, is for a greater concern by technologists for the basic needs of human beings.

The Winner Names the Age

A CHALLENGE TO SOUTHERN DECENCY

OURS IS an age that has no name. Nor will it soon have one. It has often been called "the Age of Anxiety," but it will not, I think, be known in history as that. For the winners would not call it so, and the winners do the naming.

Sometimes we forget that an age is always named for its triumphs, for the big ideas that add stature to the human being. A brief glance at any great age will remind us how true this is.

We call the 18th century the Age of Reason, of Enlightenment, of the Rights of Man. And yet, the Age of Enlightenment was an age when most Western men could not read or write. The Age of the Rights of Man was a time when a new slavery was sending deep roots into American soil and a new colonialism was beginning to lay its greedy paws on Asia and Africa. This great Age of Reason was a time when educated Europeans were deeply concerned about ghosts. The Oxford University magazines were full of discussions of ghosts, in which Samuel Johnson took part. Witches, too, were still a hot topic. This Age of Reason was an age when the blind and crippled were persecuted and half starved; when the mentally ill were chained and some were whipped to death; when epileptics were hidden away; when men looked on tuberculosis and cancer as punishments from God.

This great intellectual era, which gave us Rousseau's and Locke's writings, Voltaire's bold, sharp, ironic questions, Thomas Paine's books, and Jefferson's word on liberty and human freedom, gave us also a curious best-seller which swept Europe like wildfire. It was translated into English, French and German and was read by the intelligentsia. Parents were deeply impressed by it and shaped their methods of child guidance on it; clergymen preached on the morality it implied; doctors based their therapies on it and continued to do so, some of them until the 20th century. The book was called L'Onanisme and was written by a physician named Tissot. It was concerned with the secret sins that children commit. According to this expert, those sins caused most of the diseases known to man, from fits to diarrhœa, from insanity to blindness, deafness, muteness, cerebral palsy, rheumatism, anemia, liver upsets, etc.

All this came out of the great Age of Reason. Yet, though the 18th century was chock-full of hysteria and superstition and irrationality, we are right to call it the Age of Enlightenment. For the germinal ideas it brought to life, the vision of man's possibilities which it communicated to the future in impassioned words and symbolic acts, are, today, a part of the human heritage.

There is always a dark underside to every age: a festering, ill-smelling slum where man's enemies and errors breed. But an age is remembered not for its enemies and errors but for those qualities it dramatized which enlarge horizons and give a fine ambience to man himself. Malraux was right when he said: "Always, however brutal an age may actually have been, its style transmits its music only."

We can paint our picture, but we cannot name our age; the winner will do that. What we can do is pick the winner.

Because we can, I would like to take a look at the conditions, the ordeals out of which the winning ideas, the triumphant attitudes and techniques will come:

We are faced with three which men have never had to deal with before. Each holds high potentials for good and evil, life and death. Each affects the others. All three are concerned with new forms of power, and all will shape the earth's future.

The first can be described quite simply: It is the new power of world opinion. Walls are down; distance has been obliterated. Communication lines are strung everywhere. There is no longer a place for secrets. We cannot, as nations, gossip about each other without being heard. We cannot trick each other without being found out. We cannot hold, for ourselves alone, either new things made or new knowledge gained. We can try, but world opinion is powerful and will have its say about it.

This is a totally new thing. Suddenly the earth is stripped of its old insulated silence, its slow comeback, and is transformed into a sensitive instrument which responds with electronic speed to whatever is said and done: A few tactless words spoken by an official of one country can upset the government or economy of another. A stupid act today can bring on a world crisis tomorrow. A GI shoots a trespassing Japanese woman, and half the earth shivers. Another GI shoots an alleged peeping Tom in Formosa, a riot takes place in which the American Embassy is left a shambles, and, suddenly, everybody everywhere is either glad or sorry.

It is obvious that we have not yet developed an earth-size courtesy and tact. Nor have we yet found the new concern and new morality and new objectivity to match the new publicity and the new intimacy.

Our second ordeal is in everybody's mind: atomic energy and how to control it. We know that nuclear power has fabulous possibilities for future good, but what troubles people everywhere is its danger to us right now. We are anxious and concerned not only because the bombs can bring quick and total destruction in war, but because peacetime testing of bombs has already brought unknown damage to the human race. We are concerned that radioactive fallout has already affected the genes of a percentage of our young people everywhere. What percentage? We are not sure. How many of their children will be defective and malformed? We do not yet know. But we want to know, and we are afraid of politicians and atomic committees that try to keep secret the scientists' warnings.

World opinion alone can compel governments to use nuclear energy in the right way. Will it? That is our decision.

Our third ordeal is living in a world with hundreds of millions of free people. This is a new thing. A fabulous time of greatness can come out of it, but it is also dangerous, because free people have power—more power than a half-dozen H-bombs.

They are not likely to blow up the earth with their power, but in their ignorance and inexperience they may blow up civilization. They can destroy art and music and poetry and books and criticism; they can tear up laboratories and libraries; they can jail scientists and intellectuals and artists; they already decide what can be shown on TV and in the movies; they already dictate to the mass magazines; they can even dynamite churches. They can, when out of control, do all these terrifying things because freedom gives them strength. A free man with the vote, and with wages that give him purchasing power, is armed with some hefty weapons.

This problem of free people and their new and amazing power has thus far disturbed Communist countries less than democracies. Democracies—and we are trying to turn the whole world into democracies—cannot have uncontrolled free people around. Controls are necessary. But controls must be democratic; they must function without taking away the essential civil liberties of all men. What controls are valid?

A powerful control is constitutional law. But it will work only if the people believe in law and respect its processes.

The two strongest and best controls come from within a free man's own mind: his conscience and his reason. Both of these—to stay healthy—must be nourished on civilization's great and germinal ideas:

- The idea that every child has a right to grow.
- The idea that everyone in the community has a right to be protected from violence.
- The idea that all people can speak out and say what they think.
- The idea that a man has a right to be different in looks, beliefs, interests and talents if he does not injure others.
- The idea that truth is a search that must never stop, that both reason and imagination are necessary to that search, that scientific method is necessary, too, and cannot be interfered with except when human life is jeopardized or profound human values cheapened.
- The idea that the way a thing is done, the means used, is as important as the end sought.
- The basic idea: that God is the Ultimate Concern beyond all men, the supreme symbol—not the white race, not the Communist party, not capitalism, not any authoritarian group—and that his laws of love and brotherhood and mercy and compassion must be obeyed.

When men stop believing in these great ideas, when they silence their conscience and trample their reason, when they make their own image their god—or their economic or political beliefs their god—then we are in for trouble. For then they hold even constitutional law cheap. They sneer at the high courts of their government; indeed, they say they obey only the laws they want to.

When this happens, the free people, with their limitless potentials for growth and for good, will metamorphose into the mob. Because it is happening in our country, especially down here in the deep South where we live, I want to talk about the mob in more detail:

There are three kinds of mobs. Mob Number 1 is the mob on the street, usually dressed in ordinary clothes, sometimes in pillowcases and sheets. This is the mob that dynamites a church or a home, burns the cross, writes anonymous letters, makes anonymous phone calls, threatens and sometimes kills. This mob is made up of the delinquents and criminals of a community.

Mob Number 2 is far more dangerous because it holds more power and prestige. We might call it the mob in the gray flannel suit. Certainly many of its members are chairmen of boards of big business; others are trustees of school, church, hospital; some are directors of banks or presidents of insurance companies; others are professional men. In the South, members of Mob Number 2 often belong to the White Citizens Council.

This mob's strength lies in the fact that it hires people and sells goods. Its members use this strength to hurt those who deviate from their beliefs. They are the ones who fire the teacher who speaks up, who fire the young minister who bows to God instead of to White Supremacy; they are the ones who refuse the bank loan to the Negro who works for his civil rights and refuse the loan to the white man who tries to help the Negro secure his civil rights. They are the men who refuse to sell to those whose opinions they don't like, who refuse to insure some of those they don't like. They put the pressure on.

Mob Number 2 also gives its protection to Mob Number 1. Without that protection, Mob Number 1 would be in jail and would be kept there.

Mob Number 2's enormous power is given it by Mob Number 3, and Mob Number 3 is invisible. It lives inside men's minds. It burns a cross before a man's conscience, dynamites his reason, threatens his sense of security, sends anonymous phone calls to old memories, old fears that are sleeping in peace. This kind of thing leaves a man anxious and hating, wanting to hurt something—he doesn't know what or why.

This mob-thinking pushes Mob Number 1 out on the streets, and it condones Mob Number 2's vicious boycott and pressures and leaves its members still thinking of themselves as good men. For every violent act committed, every threat and effort at boycott and intimidation, every hate word said, there are thousands of minds thinking mob thoughts. Enough to paralyze the police force, the courts, the judges, the juries, and all law-enforcement machinery. Enough, also, to completely paralyze public opinion—and sometimes enough even to paralyze the Christian church.

Here is the crux of the matter: In a democracy, enlightened, civilized public opinion must prevail; not mob opinion, but the opinion of millions of individuals who have held on to their reason and conscience, and their belief in the free, growing human being. The only way this public opinion can prevail is for people to stand up and speak out. Those who believe violence is wrong must say so. Those who believe a man has a right to be different must say so. Those who believe a clergyman should preach according to his religious conscience should say so. Those who believe school teachers must not be asked to take a loyalty oath defending segregation or the "Southern way of life" or capitalism or any other form of idolatry must say so. Those who believe that our artists and writers must be left free to create their dreams and ideas into paintings and books must say so. Those who believe survival is more important than security must say this, too. For otherwise democracy cannot survive, nor, I think, can civilization survive. For the mob's power can destroy our freedom as completely as can any Communist dictator.

The power of free people has to be controlled, channeled, disciplined by values and knowledge and law—or it can be more dangerous to us than nuclear energy out of control. I consider the demagogue the greatest enemy a democracy has. Not the dictator; that is Communism's problem. Our problem is the demagogue, the man who deliberately betrays the people, the man who scares them, calling "Fire! Fire!" when there is no fire, who tells the people they are free to break the law, free to trample other people's rights, free to slough off their conscience and their reason to behave like madmen when they want to. This is the Number 1 subversive in our culture; this man is the people's real enemy. For he deliberately breaks down the controls of the church, of conscience, of civilization, of the courts to get the people under his control.

What can we do about it? The answer lies first in leadership, second in the determined efforts of each individual to take his stand, to speak up and try to create a climate of courage and hope and faith. Without the second, we cannot have the first: We need leaders, not martyrs. We cannot have leaders unless the best people stand by these leaders.

For fifty years, the South has had no great leader from the white race. Demagogues by the bushel but not one great leader. This, too, is part of the price we have paid for our silence and for walling ourselves away from the great ideas of our age.

We could have had great leaders: There were men in our South with the intelligence, the integrity, the vision to become great leaders, but we, the people, did not give them our support. We gave that support, every time, to the cheap, foul-mouthed demagogue who appealed not to our reason and conscience but to our anxiety; who begged us to return with him to the past, a past that never actually existed, instead of going on with the rest of mankind into the future. We let down our leaders by not building them up. A leader cannot be built up unless the people, the best people of a region, build him.

It is not too late. We can still do it. The Negro group is searching far and finding its good leaders and is beginning to give these leaders their support. What men some of them are! If the white group could only find a young leader to match the brains and heart, the integrity and vision, the courage, the energy and imagination of young Martin Luther King. For young Dr. King knows what every leader of stature must learn: that the way is as important as the goal we seek. And he has chosen the good way of non-violence, of intelligence and compassion and good will. A young white leader working shoulder to shoulder with Martin Luther King could do much to transform our South, to turn the mob spirit into the civilized Christian spirit that we should have down here.

We must, it seems to me, combine our efforts to see to it that the great ideas of our age have a chance to be acted out, to become strong enough to win over the irrational, evil enemies and errors of our age. We won't do the naming, but we will pick the winner. Shall we commit ourselves, deeply and completely, not to neurotic security but to the survival of man on this earth?

THE HOME FRONT

By William E. Bohn

The Lake on Top Of a Volcano

LAST WEEK I wrote that California's Yosemite Valley is unlike any other place on earth. I may sound fickle this week when I proclaim that Oregon's Crater Lake is surpassingly beautiful and completely unique. There may be some body of water like it in some far place of Asia or Africa, but if there is I have never heard of it. The most exceptional thing about this lake is not that—six miles wide and 2,000 feet deep—it lies on the top of a mountain completely cut off from outside water except for rain and snow. Its main distinction is not even the fact that it lies in the crater of an extinct volcano and is completely surrounded by lava cliffs rising from 500 to 2,000 feet above the water level. Its real distinction is its breathtaking beauty.

As I sit in my room in the lodge of Crater Lake National Park, I look down upon a surface of heavenly blue which all of the ladies in solid phalanx assembled have tried in vain to describe. They have called it delphinium blue, Maxfield Parrish blue, purple blue, Mediterranean blue—and finally have acknowledged their defeat by describing it as Crater Lake blue. The water immediately below me has a color which is so intense that it seems to be impregnated with some deep, deep dye. Farther off, toward the opposite shore, it turns to a lighter, gayer, more skylike hue. All viewers of this waterscape agree that they have never seen anything distantly resembling it. It gives the onlooker a sense of infinite elevation, perhaps because this vision is beyond reach. The gazing beholder cannot swim in this water, cannot even touch it.

The average visitor says almost automatically that the inexpressible color is produced by reflection of the sky. In a sense and to a certain extent, this is true. The real fact is said to be that the rays of the sun are separated by refraction from the unusually pure water much as they would be by a prismatic glass. And the blue shade, being singled out and sent up from the surface of the lake, gives the effect of a deep blue body of water.

The untechnical, rough-and-ready way of explaining how a fine lake could come into existence on the top of a mountain is to say that the mountain blew its top and then the rain and the snow filled the resulting cavity with water. What actually happened is so complex and interesting that Howell Williams, professor of geology at the University of California, has published a detailed book on it. What especially fascinates me is his account of the great, jagged rim which hems in the sheet of water. The rocks which compose it are of different sorts and have come to rest at various angles. Basing their calculations on the positions of these masses and on the glacial scratches on their surfaces, the scientists can determine the height and shape of the original peak.

My interest right now is centered in another man named Williams, Thomas J. Williams, the superintendent of this exceptionally interesting park. He came from a dirty little mining town in the East and found the West big and clean and hospitable. In the National Park Service, he has had a chance to help preserve and expand the features of the country he loves. "The job has a romantic side," he said to me. "We are trying to make people better by giving them a feeling for a mountain or a range of mountains. We have the opportunity to live in an ideal environment and to preserve and improve it. I really feel ashamed to take my pay."

The first purpose of the Park Service, Superintendent Williams explained, is to preserve the beauties of these regions which have been set aside by Congress. The second is to provide enjoyment and recreation for millions of people who have paid for these areas and who own them. The third is to increase their intelligence painlessly while they are having fun. "These three purposes," Mr. Williams drawled as we sat before the great log fire in the camp lodge, "are not separate. Through education and appreciation you secure wise usage which results in preservation. You can't get anywhere by playing the policeman. Put over the idea that the parks belong to the people and they will help to defend them."

Crater Lake impressed me as being an especially lovely place to spend a vacation. Wild flowers cover the meadows and play an especially prominent part in the community life. On this mountaintop, the evening air is too cool for the campfire talks which are a leading feature of activity in other national parks. Instead, there are talks in the Sinnott Memorial, a fine stone structure halfway down the great rim. This place allows the speaker to point out the rocky features of his environment as he goes along. Then, every evening in the lobby of the lodge there is an informal talk on some feature of the region. The cheerful tone of the occasion is set by short and amusing programs given by young college people, who do a good deal of the work about the camp. There is about the whole project a feeling of hearty enjoyment as of people come together for a good time in their own home.

Churchill's Chief of Staff

The Turn of the Tide: 1939-43.
By Arthur Bryant.
Doubleday. 624 pp. $6.95.

Reviewed by Trumbull Higgins
Assistant professor of history,
Hofstra College

IN THE first of his two-volume study of Field Marshal Sir Alan Brooke's war-time career—a study based upon the diaries and more recent observations of Brooke himself —Sir Arthur Bryant has undertaken a task beyond his capacities. Best known for his popular and patriotic surveys of Great Britain during the Napoleonic Wars, Bryant has attempted a defense of Brooke in the vastly more complex field of the Second World War without fully understanding the military implications of his subject. As a result, he not merely has done injustice to the American position on the Second Front issue, he is often taken in by Brooke's weaker arguments while ignoring those in which the British Chief of the Imperial General Staff was strong.

Brooke's fundamental position in strategy from the time of his appointment as CIGS in late 1941, succeeding Sir John Dill, appears in his advocacy of an invasion of the Western Mediterranean in 1942-43. According to Bryant's interpretation today, Brooke favored this in order to gain merchant shipping and to tie the Germans down in Southern Europe. Only in such a way, Bryant maintains in common with the usual postwar British argument, could the Allies hope to cross the English Channel in 1944 and successfully attack the fortified coast of France.

During the war, however, Brooke was too much of a military professional not to weaken this argument on behalf of what Bryant calls a "concentric" approach to the Axis with his frequent complaints regarding the incorrigible tendencies of Winston Churchill toward a similar dispersion of British strength — in Norway, in coastal raids, in short, in any type of operation which could not seriously hurt the enemy. But Bryant stresses that Brooke himself was primarily responsible for the basic Allied decision to invade French North Africa in 1942 rather than Normandy in 1943, as was so earnestly desired by the U.S. Army.

Despite Sir Alan's eventual grudging acceptance of the Combined Chiefs of Staff as an organizational device through which Churchill, in particular, could be controlled by the military, given his own conservative views on strategy the CIGS naturally thought little of the judgment of Generals Marshall and Eisenhower on this issue. And, in addition to the customary British dismissal of Eisenhower as an inadequate tactician, rather more surprisingly Brooke condemns Marshall for not understanding logistics.

Evidently Brooke reached this last conclusion because Marshall disagreed with him on the problem of obtaining shipping for a second front. The U.S. Chief of Staff felt that the net losses in tonnage incurred in opening a new Mediterranean campaign would greatly outweigh the shipping savings resulting from the shortness of this route to Suez and India. Here Marshall was on strong ground. In the First World War, the grossly uneconomical employment of shipping to sustain deadlocked British campaigns in the Mediterranean had seriously delayed the conveyance of the American Expeditionary Force to the decisive French theater; the same situation would recur in World War II.

As far as Bryant's charges on the closely related issue of landing craft are concerned, the chief reason Brooke's bête noire, the U.S. Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Ernest J. King, sent so many landing craft to the Pacific theater in 1943 was the success of Brooke's own strategy in entering the Mediterranean in 1942-43 and the consequent postponement of a second front with its need for large numbers of landing craft until 1944.

Winston Churchill, of course, was Brooke's chief problem. The Prime Minister's furious impatience, his unfairness to the British Army resulting from his own previous unhappy experiences with it, his interference in all levels of operations, his last-minute changes of plan and his refusal to make choices between alternative lines of conduct—these burdens of Brooke recall the refrain of many previous commanders who had worked with Churchill in the First World War. The most interesting revelation made by Brooke and Bryant in this connection is the Prime Minister's heretofore unknown switchover to favor a second front in France in 1943 just after the North African landings of November 1942 had finally nailed the door shut on any such possibility. Moreover, the new hero of El Alamein, General Sir Bernard Montgomery, backed the Prime Minister on this matter. No wonder his Mediterranean-minded CIGS found Churchill "the most difficult man to serve" that he had ever met.

Something of Brooke's own rather obstinate and not always very pleasant personality comes out in the argument within the British military over landing in Sicily as opposed to Sardinia; the former led to Italy and the latter, to Brooke's distress, to France. If naturally somewhat reluctant to describe Sir Alan as a man too directly, on the other hand Bryant does propagandize rather baldly on behalf of Brooke's strategy. He uses editorial devices, such as quoting from The Goebbels Diaries on the damaging effect of British bombing of German cities without citing the many official Allied surveys showing the disappointing results of this bombing campaign between 1941 and 1943.

In general, indeed, although Bryant reflects some awareness of the fine U.S. Army histories, he does not care to consider their conclusions, conclusions so often fundamentally opposed to his own or those of Sir Alan Brooke.

Nevertheless, despite often unfavorable reviews in Britain and America—mostly by the semi-official U.S. naval historian, Admiral Samuel Eliot Morison—Sir Arthur Bryant's volume constitutes the first serious modification of the normally hostile American and adulatory British accounts of Churchill's conduct of the war. Thus, this first volume is of particular value for its candid descriptions of Churchill in view of the refusal of the official British war histories to reveal differences within the British War Cabinet and consequently to make clear what the personal position of Sir Alan Brooke's overwhelming master actually was on so many of the basic issues of the war.

Ending Scientific Isolation

Atoms for the World.
By Laura Fermi.
Chicago. 227 pp. $3.75.

Reviewed by Ben Josephson Jr.

THE International Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy —the Geneva Conference of 1955— was admittedly of tremendous interest to scientists throughout the world. I do not doubt that most NEW LEADER readers followed the accounts of the conference in the public press. Since this was certainly one of the most extensively and intensively reported conferences in the history of science, they must have gotten a fairly comprehensive picture of the proceedings, the preparations, the difficulties involved, and at least a taste of the personalities of many of the scientists participating.

Consequently, I can find no concrete grounds for anything more than polite interest in this book. It is not a bad book, mind you; it is charmingly written, only rarely ponderous, and quite readable. No one who has read Mrs. Fermi's engaging tale, Atoms in the Family, will deny her way with the language. She wisely does not attempt even an unofficial history. This book is a "story" of the conference: an attempt to convey those aspects of the conference and the preparations for it which Mrs. Fermi thinks would be of general interest. She writes for people and not for posterity, and does not feel obligated to chronicle every detail and mention every participant. This is all to the good, but the book makes me somewhat uneasy.

Certainly the Geneva Conference was a considerable achievement, involving great effort on the part of many men in many countries. It is worthy of note and those who contributed to it are deserving of honor. But such conferences and meetings are the lifeblood of a vigorous science, and the rule rather than the exception. The Geneva Conference was not really a noteworthy departure from tradition, but rather a return to a tradition far older than the one of isolation practiced for the last two decades by East and West. Considered as such, I wonder whether a book of this sort does not tend to exaggerate the significance of this conference, for it was a milestone only in the sense that it got the ball rolling again after years of unnatural separation.

It is largely a question of perspective. The search is on for a better understanding of the scientist and the ways in which he practices his profession. Because the physical and political sciences are no longer mutually exclusive areas, the people of this country must eventually acquire enough understanding of the requirements and even the philosophy of science to insure the solution of problems arising when these formerly disparate fields overlap.

What disturbs me about this perfectly nice book is that it comes after years of uncertainty about the role of science in our democracy, and on the heels of other equally well-written volumes which cater to public curiosity about science and scientists and do very little to afford any concrete basis for a knowledgable attitude toward science on the part of laymen. People may eventually get the idea that all they need to know about science and scientists is contained in these works, and then we are likely to find ourselves in a very unpleasant position. I sincerely hope we never do.

The Revolt of the Moscow Writers

By George Gibian

IN 1946 Leningrad was the vanguard of insubordination in Soviet literature. Andrei Zhdanov, in his pronouncements on deviations in art and writing, at that time picked out the lyric poet Anna Akhmatova, the satirist Mikhail Zoshchenko and the Leningrad journal Zvezda as the chief offenders. The repressions which followed are still remembered in Leningrad, today comparatively docile.

In 1956 and 1957, however, the writers and editors of Moscow have rebelled, in the two volumes of a miscellany, Literary Moscow, and elsewhere.They have been most bitterly attacked by the watchdogs of the Communist party. Although at this point the repressors appear to have the upper hand, the interval of literary courage tells us much about the Russian people.

Literary Moscow (Literaturnaya Moskva) belongs to the crop of new anthologies which, together with several new magazines, have been promoted since the death of Stalin. Its first volume, 827 pages long, contained a novel, a play, poems, stories, memoirs and sketches by 39 authors of various ages and reputations, and appeared in the summer of 1956. Its editorial board, which has since come under devastating attack, consisted of nine writers, including the novelist Venyamin Kaverin, the poetess Margarita Aliger, Emilyan Kazakevich, A. Bek and V. Tendryakov.

The contents of this first volume were only mildly upsetting. There were two poems by Anna Akhmatova, one of her first appearances in print since Zhdanov attacked her. To the general public, if not to the initiated, her re-emergence in print was shocking. A Soviet Army officer who traveled in the same compartment with me on a train between Odessa and Kiev in 1956 passed my copy of Literary Moscow to everybody within reach with the whispered comment: "They are printing Akhmatova!"

Boris Pasternak, the difficult, modern, outstanding Russian poet whose lyrical poetry has often been repudiated by Soviet authorities, was also represented in the collection, but only by an article on his experience in translating Shakespeare's tragedies. Viktor Shklovsky, another famous "formalist," was represented by an equally innocent story about the painting of Tolstoy's portrait by the great painter Kramskoy. There were some poems by Margarita Aliger and Leonid Martynov—a young poet in vogue with the younger, somewhat modernistically inclined intellectuals of Russia—remarkable for their unabashed lyricism, absence of social involvement, technical expertise, and some bold linguistic devices. Otherwise the anthology was hardly outstanding; it was received on the whole favorably by the Soviet press.

In the spring of 1955, the revolutions to come in Poland and Hungary were foreshadowed by a revolt of Communist writers against Party dictation. The last year has seen the emergence of literary opposition in the Soviet Union. Here George Gibian, who visited and spoke with Moscow writers last spring, brings their story up to date. Mr. Gibian is assistant professor of Russian and English literature at Smith College. He has written on Soviet literature for the New Republic as well as academic journals, and is now preparing a study of that literature since 1953.

The editors were perhaps holding their fire until the second volume. It was this volume which was to provoke fierce attacks and which helped to give the writers of Moscow the reputation of being the most daring and rebellious of the whole Soviet Union. According to the date listed in it, the type-setting was begun on October 1, 1956, and the printing on November 26; it was sold early in 1957. The dates are important, for a great deal happened between the period of preparation and that of sale. Liberalization in Soviet writing and art strengthened steadily from the December 1954 Congress of the Writers' Union through Khrushchev's "secret speech" about Stalin at the 20th Party Congress in February 1956 to the publication of Vladimir Dudintsev's novel, Not by Bread Alone, in three instalments in August, September and October 1956. The anthology was collected and edited while discontented writers felt most encouraged to speak openly. While it was being printed, the Hungarian Revolution took place. The mood of the highest authorities changed. Dudintsev and other writers were attacked, but before the turn of the year still felt it possible to defend their work. A shift toward renewed strict controls over all spheres of culture was taking place gradually; the "thaw" was being overcome by a returning frost.

Literary Moscow, Vol. II, was so much more provocative than the first volume that it is already assured a place in the history of Russian literature. It contains, besides conventional Soviet writing, the following unusual material: two "rehabilitations," one posthumous, the other pre-sepulchral; a fable; an essay in literary criticism; and a novel and several short stories.

One symbolic rehabilitation is Ilya Ehrenburg's eulogistic essay on Marina Tsvetayeva, a poetess who emigrated from Russia in 1922 and returned to Moscow in 1939. She found herself persecuted and in 1941, Ehrenburg says laconically, "she ended her life by suicide." The anthology also prints nine poems from various periods of her life, the latest from 1933. They are sensitive, lyrical, subjective, quite the contrary of the usual "socialist realism." A footnote announces a forthcoming one-volume edition of her work.

The other rehabilitee is still alive —Yuri Olesha, who came into disfavor by his short novel, Envy, published in 1927 and considered by many the best of all Soviet novels. The conflict between the pre-Soviet and the new man was presented in it in so skilful a manner that Soviet critics at first believed it an attack on the decadent past. It took them several months to realize the shoe was on the other foot. Olesha made courageous speeches in 1932 and 1934 in defense of the writer's integrity, and was silenced. Literary Moscow printed extracts from his "Literary Diaries"—little sketches, notes, thoughts on literature, recollections and portraits of various authors. Original and valuable as they are, the first reaction to them is one of pleased acknowledgement of tangible evidence that Olesha is alive and being published again.

Sergei Mikhalkov, playwright, author of fables, and favorite children's author, prints a versified version of a joke which has been circulating in various forms throughout the Soviet bloc, a comment on "socialist realism" with its obligatory untruths. The poem, "Three Portraits," tells of a great khan who has only one eye and one arm and orders three artists to paint his portrait. The first paints him with both eyes and both arms; he is chased away in disgrace as a patent lakirshchik, varnisher of reality. The second one paints the khan as he is; the khan becomes enraged, accuses him of emphasizing his deficiencies to the joy of all enemies, and the "naturalist" perishes. The third painter portrays the ruler in profile, with one eagle's eye and one arm holding firmly a shield, so that one cannot see that there is no eye and no arm on the other side. The clever evader, who is rewarded by decorations, fame and money, Mikhalkov implies, is the successful artist of Soviet Russia—the type of a Konstantin Simonov—feathering his bed by politic shutting of his eyes to the seamy side of things. In the best Russian tradition of Krylov, Mikhalkov resorts to allegory to make his comment on the fate of artists under a "khanist" regime.

Most daring of all the works in the collection are those of A. Kron, Venyamin Kaverin, Yuri Nagibin, Alexander Yashin and Nikolai Zhdanov. Kron is the only contributor who made his critical comments in broad ideological terms. In his essay, "Notes of a Writer," he analyzes the consequences of Stalinism in depth. He makes fun of all the titled aristocrats of Soviet art—the poets laureate, meritorious artists, national artists, national artists of constituent republics—and compares them with the Tsarist proliferations of honors and titles satirized by Chekhov. He shows himself to be a vigorous advocate of freedom and enemy of authoritarianism:

"Where cult is present, scientific thought must give way to blind faith, creativity to dogma, public opinion to caprice. The cult gives birth to a hierarchy of servants of the cult—the deity must have worshippers and obsequiousness. The cult is incompatible with criticism; the healthiest criticism is easily twisted into a heresy. . . . Even the cultish deification of the People with a large P has its reverse side—it lowers the individual man. The leader was the servant of the People, but when millions of masters arose at the mere mention of the servant's name, there was in it something alien to those democratic traditions in which we were brought up by the Revolution and the Soviet social order. . . . Artistic creativity is inseparable from social initiative, from innovating experiments. And the innovator—in whatever era he lives—always outstrips the perceptions of his contemporaries in something and is not always immediately understood. Where the taste of one man becomes incontrovertible, a leveling down and a crude interference in the artistic process, a harmful tutelage which traumatizes talent but fully sets up craftsmen, are inevitable. Under those conditions, not to be understood means to be condemned. Where one man owns the truth uncontrolled, artists are relegated to the modest role of illustrators and ode-singers."

Years have gone by since such a firm defense of freedom was heard in public in Russia.

Kaverin, in a section of a novel, Searches and Hopes, follows the tribulations of a woman biologist in her efforts to develop a Soviet process for the manufacture of penicillin. She succeeds in the end, but not before she has been obstructed by many powerful officials, her husband has been condemned to forced labor on trumped up charges, and she and the reader have had their eyes opened to the travesties on justice perpetrated by bureaucrats. Only minor improvements take place at the end of the book; there is no obligatory happy end. The main villain happens to die, but he had been in power and generally honored up to his death and countless others remain in the saddle. Kaverin's image of Soviet science and technology is indeed unflattering.

Two stories by Nagibin deal with related themes. In one, two hunters arrive in a region of Russia which seems to have been by-passed by both the 20th century and the Soviet system. It is surrounded by swamps and forests, has almost no contact with the outside world, and ignores laws and regulations of Soviet life. Most inhabitants support themselves by year-round hunting and fishing. The Party secretaries supposedly in charge of the region have all failed to do anything about the situation. The fantastic picture of life in the backward territory resembles a 19th-century Russian satire. The story may be partly redeemed, for a Soviet critic, by the fact that one of the hunters turns out to be the new Party secretary in disguise, who has resourcefully used this ruse in order to find out the truth about the region and who presumably will reform things in the future.

But the other hunter is a more significant character. His one pronounced characteristic is fear. He does not dare to criticize or listen to criticism: "He was a man once and for all frightened. Even in scholarship, he chose an area infinitely removed from actual life: He studied ancient Khazar ornaments." The story is entitled "Khazar Ornament," underlining the significance of this detail. Nagibin is calling attention to one product of the Soviet system hitherto unsung by its literature—although no doubt more typical than the smiling, tractor-driving heroes of the posters—the broken man winning his peace through yielding to his fright.

Nagibin's second story in the anthology, "Light in the Window," does in the form of fiction what Kron does in his essay—probe the consequences of what is euphemistically designated as the "cult of personality." The head of a rest home sets apart a suite of rooms just in case "an important personage" from a ministry should some day visit his establishment. He equips it with a billiard table and TV set, orders a cleaning woman to look after it, locks it up and settles down to a long wait. The high official does not come. Meanwhile, nobody is allowed to enter the rooms. Finally, the cleaning woman rebels and ensconces herself in the special quarters without permission. The director then realizes that the welfare of simple people should not be sacrificed to their superiors. Nagibin applauds the trivial but symbolic revolution against the privileges of the new Soviet ruling class.

Zhdanov's "Return Home" deals with the contrast between a Communist leader's view of life seen from his office and the conditions on a collective farm. A successful official learns that his mother has died in the country; he visits the village where she lived and is overwhelmed by the poverty of the farmers, their just complaints, and his inability to defend the city-based bureaucracy's mistreatment of the farmers. His hurried return to the safety of his office is a flight from reality back to the reassuring clichés of a Party career shielded from the harsh facts of real life.

An equally bold exposure of country life is Alexander Yashin's "Levers." A group of Party members on a collective farm complain bitterly about people at the Party district office, their handling of the Communists on the grassroots level, their failure to understand the farmers' difficulties. They dislike being treated like "levers," mere tools of the Party officials one step higher. Yet when they constitute themselves into a Party meeting, the same men immediately change and actually do become mere tools: They repeat what they had been told to say by the district headquarters, losing the genuine humanity they had shown in their earlier, informal session. As soon as the Party meeting is over, they drop the Party roles and begin complaining again. Yashin leaves no doubt about where his sympathies lie. His concluding sentence describes the farmers who reassumed their plain selves: "Again they were pure, cordial, direct people, people, not levers."

Yashin reverses the stereotypes of the Soviet dogma according to which the Party uplifts people and guides them wisely in their personal and collective affairs. Yashin's Party abuses individuals, treats them impersonally, bosses them, and, like the authorities in Zhdanov's story, has little information about or interest in their problems. Moreover, by assuming the role of Party members, the men descend to the low level of parrots lacking thought and initiative.

Taken as a group, the eight or nine iconoclastic works in Literary Moscow, Vol. II represent a comprehensive indictment of Soviet life. They attack the villainy of powerful men entrenched in positions of power, abusing them for personal aims; the nefarious effect Party life has on individuals, frightening some ("The Khazar Ornament"), metamorphosing others into mere tools; the Party and governmental authorities' ignorance of their subjects' lives; the resulting gulf between rulers and ruled; the social system which has made all these conditions possible.

The anthology, an attack on Stalinism which seeped down through the various strata of Soviet life, is also proof of a renascence of humanism—a plea for conditions of life in which powerful officials would not be worshipped and supplied with special wings of rest homes, in which people would be human beings, not slaves, frightened scholars, or ostrich-like officials.

When the Party permitted a liberalization in literature, it presumably aimed at promoting writing critical of bureaucratic abuses, exerting a corrective effect on industrial and technological conditions. The writers went far beyond that aim. In fact, the material side of the evils they criticize seems to interest them far less than the intangible side; the poverty of goods pains them less than the poverty of spirit. They are crying out against a spiritual degradation. Kron summed it up in the phrase: "One cannot look ahead when one's head is bowed down."

The official answer to the courageous rebels of Literary Moscow came soon. In May 1957, at a plenary meeting of the board of the Writers' Union, a report of the secretariat emphasized at length the beneficial role of the Party in all aspects of life, especially in literature. Kron's "Notes of a Writer" were accused of improperly suggesting that the Party leadership and the Government were the main causes of the difficulties of the Russian theater; lengthy counter-arguments were advanced. The report also attacked "ideological wavering" and "straggling," and affirmed that "after the not-yet-liquidated danger of varnishing and lack of conflict, there arises the danger of one-sided negative representation of reality." Yashin's story was included on a list of examples of bad works—those which "showed shady sides of life but were unable to reveal the activity of the masses . . . and hence gave a one-sided representation of reality," failed to show that "the new in our society is gaining a victory over the old, the progressive over the backward."

This meeting of the plenum was very different from the relatively free-wheeling debates of the Writers' Union congress in December 1954, the discussions of Dudintsev's novel in October and in December 1956, at which his supporters dared to stand up and defend him, or the March 1957 meeting of the Moscow branch of the Writers' Union [see "'Disturbances' Among Soviet Writers," NL, May 20]. The reports of the May meeting of the plenum read more like the proceedings of a Star Chamber arraigning a culprit than a free deliberation.

The recalcitrant writers and editors were charged with helping the West, which was alleged to be reaching out to them "a friendly hand with poison in it." They were urged to stand up and recant. They would not. This refusal was criticized as a deplorable attempt at the "heroism of silence." The demand for them to speak was clearly a demand for apology and disavowal of the heretical writings. The Moscow writers had the courage to remain silent.

Early in June, a joint meeting was held of the Moscow writers' Party organization and the board of the Writers' Union. A report about the May meeting was read, accusing Kaverin of being "impatient of criticism," and the editorial board of Literary Moscow of persevering in their errors. Some resistance was still offered. According to the Literary Gazette, Kazakevich in a last-ditch stand "spoke extremely one-sidedly about the work of the editorial board of Literary Moscow. He defended works published in the second volume. . . . In the speech of E. Kazakevich there was no sign of a wish to admit honestly the errors committed. . . . A. Yashin . . . acted as if even by this time he could not be certain what was wrong with 'Levers.'"

Serious threats were made. The rebellious writers were accused of "cheap demagoguery," of supplying ammunition to Soviet enemies, of being a "splinter group," of secretly holding to a political platform "not in agreement with the policy of the Party in the area of literature."

In the following few weeks, similar meetings of writers were held in Leningrad, Rostov and many other cities. The pattern was to explain to local authors the new "atmosphere of unanimity, the desire to insure a consolidation of all forces of Soviet literature on the basis of Party principle." A newspaper account says that Leningrad writers repudiated "the notorious 'heroism of silence'" of the Moscow authors. Yet, significantly, it admits a boycott took place. As at the earlier meeting in Moscow, "many important writers simply did not honor our meeting with their presence. The meeting is justifiably awaiting speeches by those writers [the novelist Vera Panova among them] clarifying their position in relation to the results of the third plenum." Condemnation of the "rotten skepticism" in literature, exemplified by Not by Bread Alone and Yashin's story, was demanded.

The confessional thus thrust on deviating writers could no longer be avoided. On June 11, at a general meeting of the writers of Moscow, the editors capitulated. The Literary Gazette reports: "E. Kazakevich, in a speech, and also M. Aliger and A. Bek, whose letters were read at the meeting, accepted the just criticism of errors committed by the editorial board of Literary Moscow and gave assurance that they will correct their errors through further work."

A chapter of the breakthrough of freedom in Soviet literature is closing. Heroic writing, succeeded by heroic silence, seems to have been overcome, although there is still some slight hope in the fact that Alexander Yashin, Vladimir Dudintsev and others have not yet publicly surrendered, as far as is known at this time; the main culprits among the editors, not the contributors, have been forced to recant.

Ominous, however, was the July 23 Literary Gazette editorial linking the writers with the "anti-Party group of Malenkov, Kaganovich, Molotov and Shepilov," which it accused of "confused and false directives about the theory and practice of literature." The editorial attacked Shepilov for a "'streamlined' and unprincipled attitude toward clearly unhealthy phenomena," Kaganovich for "demagogically accusing good Ukrainian poets of nationalism," and Malenkov for "vulgarizing statements about the typical."

Yet, whatever the future brings, the writers' stand has already shown how deep is Russia's thirst for truthfulness and human dignity.

DEAR EDITOR

DJILAS

It is amusing and instructive to observe how people unwittingly read their own prejudices and preferences into other people's words. This profound thought comes to me as I read the splendid letter by my friend Norman Thomas in your August 12 issue urging free-world pressures to save Milovan Djilas. The courageous Yugoslav is being kept in jail, Thomas says, "because he has dared to think out loud—and brilliantly—in criticism of Communism and praise for democratic socialism."

The "praise for democratic socialism" is the part that touched off this letter. I have read the Djilas book carefully, several times. There is in it no such praise. Perhaps Djilas does consider himself in a vague way a democratic socialist—that is usually the next stage in the process of disillusionment with Communism and then with national Communism. But he certainly does not in his book make any forthright argument for that stage.

In the brief preface to The New Class, Djilas writes: "As I became increasingly estranged from the reality of contemporary Communism, I came closer to the idea of democratic socialism." And that's the end of that subject. His faith in it, at the time he wrote, presumably was not intense enough to induce him to explain and defend that alternative. On the contrary, most readers will interpret his analysis of Communism as applicable, except in the matter of degree, to socialism as well.

Take, for instance, this passage on the position of the wage-earner under Communism: "The worker finds himself in the position of having not only to sell his labor; he must sell it under conditions which are beyond his control, since he is unable to seek another, better employer. There is only one employer, the state. The worker has no choice but to accept the employer's terms." This argument surely would apply under socialism generally.

Or consider the passage in which Djilas shows that "in Communist systems, thefts and misappropriations are inevitable." The universal poverty, he explains, is not the sole or the main reason for this, but the fact that "the property does not seem to belong to anyone—all valuables are somehow made valueless, thus creating a favorable atmosphere for theft and waste." Would not roughly the same atmosphere prevail in socialism?

Djilas's entire analysis of the Communist economy, too, will hardly fortify the position of socialists. The catastrophic waste caused by the state as monopoly-owner, the canceling out of supply-and-demand influences, the dominance of political over economic motivations, etc. find extreme expressions under a Communist dictatorship. But if Djilas really believes that such factors would not produce approximately the same results under so-called democratic socialism, he fails to say so.

I don't, in this letter, want to spark a controversy on the merits of democratic socialism. But it does seem to me useful to make clear the simple fact that Djilas neither praises nor (except by implication) knowingly attacks that alternative to Communism. He simply doesn't deal with the subject.

UPTON SINCLAIR

After reading "A Morning with Upton Sinclair," by William E. Bohn (NL, August 5), I could not resist the urge to write a few lines of appreciation. Not only was Dr. Bohn true to form in the skill with which he told his story, but he rekindled my memory of the many occasions when I visited Upton Sinclair on trips to California to address student groups and labor unions. My thanks to him for reminding me of those days.

Dear Ed:

Many thanks for your letter informing me of the current Southern swing by Pat Malin and Rowland Watts. I have encountered no one who knew they were coming except Sam Lubin, who received word from you. I have heard from our associated state group in Arkansas that they have just been in Little Rock, and I am in hopes that they will stop by Atlanta.

As you will see from the minutes of the last Southern meeting, just mailed out, the proposal of the Southern agency people has now been spelled out somewhat more fully. It is good to know that you are taking a direct interest in seeing that something along these lines gets worked out.

With warmest regards,

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Dear Harold:

It is possible that Pat Malin of the ACLU has already been in touch with you. If not, you should know that he and Rowland Watts (staff counsel of ACLU) are in the South at this very moment, recruiting lawyers who would be available to ACLU to handle civil liberties situations as they may arise, and to advise Southern agencies and groups in respect to those situations. This project developed from your own disclosure at the last CCD meeting of the need for such services on a broad scale, and for our part we intend to help, to the extent possible, by suggesting the names of lawyers who may be available for this purpose.

I give you this information so that you may be guided accordingly, because I note in the minutes of the last interagency meeting in Atlanta that this was one of the principal subjects of discussion.

As always, my best to you.

Dear Ed:

Your conversation with Pat Malin produced quick results. I had a call from him day before yesterday in which he informed me that Roland Watts and another member of ACLU would attend the February meeting. This should give us a chance to have full communication about ACLU's efforts as they bear on the needs of the agencies active in the South. I agree with you wholeheartedly that we should avoid duplication.

We have been in touch with P. D. East and have given him the information he wanted about the unidentified contributor.

It was very helpful as well as pleasant to get caught up with our many common concerns while you were hear. I am grateful, as always, for your help.

Dear Harold:

I spoke to Pat Malin today. By this time he should have been in touch with you, to fill you in on the project on which ACLU has been working. I believe it has made some rather good progress -- certainly enough to discourage anyone else from coming in to set up a competing project. This could only serve to complicate and confuse the situation -- which is already complicated and confused enough.

Please let me know whether you encounter any further difficulties in relating SRC -- and the other Southern agencies -- to the ACLU enterprise; you must know that I want to be helpful in smoothing the way to closer cooperation.

It is always good to see you and talk with you. My warm regards.

Dear Ed:

I have recently been out to Dallas working with a community group which includes part of the power structure and representative leadership from the Negro and white communities. As you know Dallas faces a court order to desegregate and the Board of Education has said that it will announce its plan for desegregation during the summer. In many ways Dallas is one of the key cities of the South and what happens there will affect what happens in other metropolitan centers of the South. Dallas and Atlanta are the two truly metropolitan centers in the South and therefore are keys to the South's future.

Your man, Gus Falk, has given invaluable aid to the work in Dallas. He has been one of the prime movers in the strategy committee which has brought together white and Negro leadership in honest communication for the first time in many moons. Gus has the experience and the skills necessary to contribute meaningfully to the process of desegregation. I would hope that it is possible for him to devote a considerable amount of his time in the Dallas area. Without his assistance and continuing efforts the work of the strategy committee would be hampered. He is not only a good egg but a skilled practitioner and the AJC is fortunate ih having his services.

Best personal regards.

Dear Fred:

It was thoughtful of you to write as you did concerning the contribution of Gus Falk to the program in Dallas. He has been reporting to us from time to time his activities in connection with preparing the Dallas community for the inevitability of integration, and we are delighted that he has been able to relate himself -- and the AJC -- to a meaningful and constructive program.

I agree with you that Dallas presents a challenge, one which I am confident the people of that community will meet uneventfully -- especially if it has the guidance of seasoned practitioners like yourself and others.

Dear Ed:

Thanks for your note of 7th March telling me that you had lunch with Harold Fleming on the 6th. He was correct in advising you that the Atlanta meeting of the American Bar Association had been billed as a "regional" meeting. This was not clear in the newspaper reports at the time I wrote to you. I am glad that you feel, however, that a national meeting of the ABA in one of the defiant states would be inexcusable. I wonder if the national leadership of the Bar Association understands that many agency leaders feel that way.

Dear Fred:

I had lunch with Harold Fleming yesterday, and he advised me that the recent meeting of the American Bar Association was billed as a "regional" meeting. If that is true, do you not agree that it would be difficult for us to complain about the fact that it had held a meeting in a Southern state? It would be virtually impossible to find a Southern state that has not in one form or another thumbed its nose at the Supreme Court.

The situation would have been different if this had been a national -- rather than regional -- meeting, for in that event the selection of any Southern state by this group would have been inexcusable.

I would appreciate any further views you may have.

My warm regards.

I just spoke with Rowland Watts who tells me that Ernest Angell has written to Douglas Arant of Birmingham to ascertain whether Mr. Van W would be available to the Birmingham group. He claims that as of today Arant has not replied, but that he hopes such a response will be coming in soon, after which he will be in touch with you.

Is there any way of ascertaining whether, indeed, Arant ever received such a letter from Angell? Watts did seem to be somewhat harassed; he claims he has just gotten an assistant who is beginning work on what he calls a "huge backlog of unfinished business." Even so, I think they have handled this affair most carelessly and inconsiderately.

Best wishes.

Dear Harold:

I had a phone call last Friday from a consultant for some foundation (otherwise unidentified), seeking my view as to the desirability and feasibility of a study in which, apparently, you were interested. The study had to do with the extent to which - in Virginia and in Arkansas - the closing of public schools affected the various communities in which the closings took place, i.e., the number of young people involved, what substitute facilities have been created, how many are taking advantage of those facilities, etc., etc. I wanted you to know that, suspecting that your interest in the study was a more intimate one than had been revealed to me, I endorsed it heartily.

Do let me know whether the grant is made, and I hope you will share with us the results of the study.

It was good seeing you the other day, even so briefly.

Dear Morris:

We talked with NBC today and learned that it had issued an invitation to Senator Talmadge and Roy Wilkins to join Chet Huntley this Sunday over the network, as a gesture of response to NAACP's demand for equal time, to neutralize Huntley's rather surprising statement last Sunday. Up to an hour ago (3 P.M.) NBC had not had any responses to the invitations.

I spoke with Dr. John Morcell, who may be known to you as Roy Wilkins' administrative assistant (Roy was testifying before the Commission on Civil Rights this afternoon), who told me that, so far as he knew, Roy has no intention of debating the issue with Senator Talmadge - on TV or elsewhere; that NAACP is demanding, and hopes to receive, an undiluted half-hour in which to comment upon and make appropriate response to Huntley's comments. I encouraged him to hold firm to this resolve, eschewing any and every otherwise unacceptable alternative. I trust that this is what will ultimately ensue.

If any further developments should arise, be assured that I will be in touch with you.

Dear Harold:

I want to report to you that my luck is not any better in trying to secure the meeting with top management of Woolworth and Kress.

I shall keep on trying, however, and will keep you advised if any developments should arise that are worth reporting on.

Dear Ed:

Thanks for your letter of March 9, and for your good efforts all along the line. There may well be better ways than a Blue-Gray meeting to help Woolworth management meet this situation constructively. If so, I am sure you will uncover them.

In any case, as Harry Fleischman knows, I expect to be in New York on Thursday, March 23 for the Mass Media Committee Meeting, and will probably come up a day early for other purposes. If at that time there are useful purposes I can serve, please let me know.

My best regards.

I thought I should report that I have at long last been able to make an extremely important contact with the top management of Woolworth.

While I am by no means able to report that a meeting such as you envisage can be arranged, I am in position to say that if my present contact cannot persuade management to consent, no one else can.

I'll be in touch with you soon. Meanwhile, best regards.

Dear Ed:

If I hadn't picked up a virus in your fair city, you would have heard from me well before now. As it is, I'm just back at the desk.

Benjamin Muse is to be here for a conference on Monday, and will proceed from here to Florida, where, as you know, Collins is promoting the formation of bi-racial committees to seek solutions to the lunch counter controversy. I hope that, out of our talk, we can come up with one or more specific steps that will test the good faith of the national chains. In any case, I will be writing Helfrich shortly and will, of course, send you a copy.

On another note of relevant interest. We have a report that the mayor's committee in High Point, N. C., has proposed that three variety stores integrate their lunch counters on a 60-day trial basis. The stores, two of which are Woolworth's, have reacted coolly to the suggestion and have so far declined to go along. I just talked to the Friends Service Committee, which has a regional office in High Point; they are to explore a meeting with Woolworth brass on this very concrete situation.

I'll keep you posted from this end. Meanwhile, my thanks again for your effective help.

Dear Harold:

Consider this a report on the suggestion that the Commission on Civil Rights, through its State Advisory Committees in the South, become active as convening and conciliation vehicles in the "sit-in" communities.

John Feild was good enough to arrange a meeting in Washington yesterday with John Roxborough, newly appointed Legal Assistant to Commissioner Hanna. I flew to Washington for the purpose. Roxborough thought well of the proposal, but was not certain that his Commissioner would think likewise, primarily because he was eager to reduce the areas of highly charged controversy in which the Commission would be likely to find itself. (Let's pass, for the moment, the absence of realism in that posture!) Roxborough himself, newly come to Washington, and a Negro, seemed rather timid about the role he could play in promoting the proposal. However, he said that he would explore the possibilities with other members of the staff.

George Johnson was tied up in a Commission meeting which, by coincidence, was going on during the very time that we were lunching, and he was unavailable to us during the rest of the afternoon. John Feild promised to establish contact with him today to secure his reaction to the plan.

A few moments ago I finished a lengthy telephone conversation with Harris Wofford at South Bend. By coincidence, it develops that Harris had prepared a memorandum for Father Hesburgh, for use at yesterday's Commission meeting, on this very subject. Harris told me that he had discussed the idea at length with Hesburgh about a week ago, feeling that the time had long since arrived for the State Advisory Committees to move into this critically developing situation, aggressively and meaningfully. Hesburgh was not certain that this could be put on yesterday's agenda, since they were discussing the "hot" subject of employment. Beyond casually mentioning to Harris this morning that they had had a "rough time" in Washington yesterday, there is no indication at the moment that this subject was discussed. However, as soon as Wofford learns whether the matter was explored, and just what came out of that exploration, he will advise me.

Meanwhile, it was felt that you might want to discuss this further with Gordon Tiffany, with whom, Harris tells me, you have a warm relationship. For reasons which he said you would readily understand, it might be wiser not to indicate he was behind the proposal; if Hesburg wants to reveal that to Tiffany, that would be all right with him.

Mr.Harold Flemming April 19, 1960

Another step that might be taken at this time is to examine the composition of the various State Advisory Committees in those states in which hope is greater for early solutions, if the ideal convening auspices could be found. Harris thought North Carolina was such a state, also Florida -- especially because of the encouraging recent developments in that state; perhaps Georgia's Committee might lend itself to this use -- you would know that better than I.

I have withheld so far from telephoning our friend, Mr. Helfrich, Vice President of Kress. I wanted to learn just a little bit more concerning the feasibility of and receptivity to this proposal -- which, by the way, attracts me enormously (why didn't someone think of it before this?). If we find that the receptivity is high, I will then be in position to tell Helfrich so, making it a little more difficult for him than otherwise to refuse to indicate a similar receptivity on the part of his own company and the others.

As soon as I hear from John Feild and Wofford, I will be further in touch with you. In the meanwhile, keep your fingers crossed, and do advise me of any developments when they arise.

Dear Harold:

Last Friday afternoon Gordon Tiffany phoned me just before returning to Washington, following his hour-and-a-half-long meeting with Mr. Helfrich, Vice President of Kress.

Tiffany told me that he thought the meeting "definitely worthwhile," because he had gained some new insights into the position of the variety chain stores toward a mode of adjustment of the sit-in problem, and felt that he had established a valuable contact with the chain store group (Helfrich is authorized to speak for Woolworth's, et al.).

I understand that from this point forward, Tiffany will want, quite unofficially and informally, to activate the State Advisory Committees in those Southern states in which progress toward adjustment seems at this moment to be most promising.

I know you share my hope that he will move with all deliberate speed. Perhaps some gentle prodding from friendly sources would help. I leave the manner of doing so to your own good judgment.

We may have started something here; if Mr. K. of the Soviet Union, doesn't decide to make us all sit down, perhaps the people of the South will begin eating again like civilized human beings.

Best regards.

Dear Ed:

I have looked over our file of human relations literature aimed at the police. Most of it, as you say, is too sophisticated or too poorly auspiced for distribution in Birmingham. (In fact, it is a real question whether there is anything worthwhile that Birmingham policemen could stomach.)

The pamphlet I am enclosing might have possibilities. The trouble is that it is almost certainly out of print, even if the New Orleans police department is willing for it to be used elsewhere. But it is the nearest thing I can find to a suitable mailing piece.

Let me know if you decide to pursue it.

Dear Harold:

Father Albert Foley has been in touch with me in behalf of the Alabama Council on Human Relations (of which Father Foley is President), for some appropriate literature which the Council can distribute to members of the Police Force in Birmingham. It appears that they have been involved recently in some scrapes with Negro servicemen, as well as some visiting Ethiopian dignitaries, who have been put upon and abused, needless to say, without provocation or reason.

This is of a piece with the fairly characteristic behavior of large numbers of the Birmingham Police Force toward the Negro population generally; some of the Police Force, I am told, are said to be active members of the KKK.

The sort of thing that Father Foley has in mind to distribute probably doesn't yet exist. Your own "Race and Law Enforcement" (February 1952), while excellent, is addressed more to the citizen than to the policeman and, from Father Foley's description of the Birmingham Police Force, would probably be too sophisticated. So, too, are the materials distributed by other groups: Mayor's Commission on Human Rights of Milwaukee, the NCCJ, etc.

I don't know whether Father Foley has been in touch with you on this subject, but, meanwhile, I am eager to be helpful to him, if possible. Could you refer me to one or more pieces of literature published by some agency -- public or private -- whose imprimatur would be not too distasteful to the average Birmingham policeman, which would be helpful in driving home to such folk the un-American character, etc., etc., of "pushing around" the Negro citizen? In short, is there anything in existence which could be sent in the mail to the members of the Birmingham Force, addressed to them at their homes, which would be influential and persuasive, in a down-to-earth style, not preachy, not high-flown, not maudlin?

Dear Steve:

I have your long and newsy letter of September 10th. I shared it with two of my colleagues who were helpful in some phases of the Hughes matter.

I was shocked not alone by your own disclosure of the action of the North Alabama Methodist Conference last Thursday, but also by the item in yesterday's N.Y. Times to the effect that Hughes has been "assigned" ("banished" would be more accurate!) to Rhodesia by the Bishop. How savage can people be?

The cost of the proceedings comes as a surprise to me; I can't imagine why it should be so astronomically high. Raising the money is going to be somewhat difficult, I imagine (you already have my letter concerning the rather ungenerous contribution of the National Council of Churches). Naturally, I will do what I can to interest people in the situation, in the hope that we can get some money to defray Hughes' legal expenses.

In this connection, I don't remember whether I mentioned to you, or you may already know, that a few years ago the American Friends Service Committee received from the Fund for the Republic a rather substantial sum to help pay the legal expenses of persons invoking Constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and press. It is my recollection that it was called the "conscience fund." The Hughes case would, it seems to me, come squarely within the purpose and function of that fund.

Harold Fleming (to whom I am sending a copy of this letter) might want to make a direct approach to the Friends in Philadelphia. If neither of you have access to that group, advise me and I will establish contact with them for you.

I have not yet given up hope that the N. Y. Times might be brought into closer relationship with the Hughes matter, even if it is after the event. I am trying even now to reach the President of the Times, whom I have known for many years, in the hope that that organization might be made to recognize its moral obligation.

As for speaking engagements for Hughes: Is his availability for that purpose now realistic, in light of the Rhodesian assignment? If it is, while I am not very sanguine about being able to secure those engagements for him, certainly I will try.

Your description of what took place in Birmingham during the fateful days, makes me wonder whether a system of justice which is so cruelly used has any survival value. I should imagine that the young lawyers of Alabama would want to scream with rage over the perversion of such a democratic institution as the grand jury. It is not the first time that this has happened, nor will it be the last -- what surprises me is the lack of capacity for indignation, from which most lawyers suffer.

You must know that I'll continue to do what I can, and will be in touch with you soon.

Best regards.

Dear Ed:

Thanks for sending me copies of your letters to Father Foley -- and, of course, all your good efforts on behalf of Bob Hughes. The National Council of Churches' contribution of $500 is indeed disappointingly small. I have talked with Will Campbell and gather that he has exhausted all the efforts he can make to get the sum increased. Of course, Will works under Oscar Lee and is naturally limited in his approach.

As you know, Father Foley and other Alabama Council people are making every effort to raise some funds within Alabama. I have talked to a few people from whom we can probably get some part of the amount that is needed. But, like you, I find the total local cost astronomical, and I am not at all sanguine about all of it being raised.

Several people with whom I have talked have expressed the conviction that the New York Times has a moral obligation to help the Alabama Council with this expense. All of them expressed the intention of saying so to some of the Times brass. I have no idea what the disposition of the Times would be in this matter and I am unwilling to complicate our press relations by trying to exact quid pro quo.

But if a way occurs to you by which this approach could be furthered, do let me know.

I was in New York briefly last week, but Josephine Wilkins, who had scheduled me, did so with such thoroughness that I had no opportunity to call you, which was a disappointment. I hope, however, to see you again soon.

Dear Steve:

I just heard from Dr. Oscar Lee of the National Council of Churches. He is about to send Reverend Robert Hughes a check, which I doubt will be in excess of $500, for application against his legal fees.

I was somewhat disappointed in the amount, and told him so. But he explained that they have no funds available for legal fees as such, but only to help "distressed" clergymen who are under pressures arising from the school desegregation issue.

Perhaps Harold Fleming, to whom a copy of this letter is being sent, might also express to Will Campbell some measure of disappointment. Campbell has been in touch with Lee and, I believe, has been trying to persuade the National Council to be somewhat more generous. I think Campbell would be an ally in this connection.

Dear Harold:

I tried to reach you today at the Seminary, but apparently you did not get my message.

Roland Watts called me yesterday to ask whether we would be helpful in securing for counsel for the petitioners in the Sumpter County (S. C.) case, some expert witnesses -- social psychologists and sociologists -- to testify in support of the petition of the so-called "Turks," who seek to transfer their children from segregated schools to desegregated schools.

What little I know of the case comes to me from the newspapers, as well as a memorandum prepared by Ira Kaye, who is counsel to the petitioners in that case. You must know infinitely more, and undoubtedly have some views on the subject. I would appreciate having the benefit of your views, as to whether we should get into the situation and, if so, will it be possible (certainly it would be advisable) for me to locate these experts in the South, probably at one or more of the universities there.

The question of expense bothers me a little bit. What would be involved, among other things, would be the visit of these experts to Sumpter County and examination by them of the children affected, as well as an examination of the schools they now attend and the schools to which they seek to be transferred. All of this, I gather, is necessary to satisfy the requirements of the Pupil Placement Law of South Carolina. If these experts command very high fees, I am afraid we might have to hesitate entering the situation, although I am eager that we be as helpful as we can. If the expenses represent only a modest sum, I think I can scratch up the money.

I would be grateful to you for your comments. Meanwhile, best regards.

Dear Ed:

You may recall our telephone conversation concerning the suit against the Mississippi Sovereignty Commission seeking to enjoin payment of state funds to the Citizens Councils.

It has taken me a while to get hold of a copy of the pleadings, enclosed.

TThe The young lawyer who brought the suit and is pressing it as a matter of personal conviction (despite loss of the two labor plaintiffs) is William L. Higgs, 707 N. Congress Street (Tel. FL. 3-5166), Jackson. He is a graduate of the Harvard Law School and has been practicing in Jackson since 1958. He is a native of Greenville, Miss., a friend and former school mate of Hodding Carter, III. Hodding the elder called me recently to say that Higgs needs money to carry the case to the Supreme Court; no large sum apparently. Hodding said that "$1,000 would go a long way toward meeting the need," and that he himself was planning to contribute something.

I haven't talked to Hodding further about this since his call three weeks or so ago; and I haven't talked to Higgs at all. If you know of possible contributors, I should think we would want to check the situation again before contributions are actually sent.

I am also doing what I can to interest a prospective donor or two who are not wedded absolutely to tax-exempt giving.

I have spoken to Harry Fleischman about the matter and will appreciate your sharing this information with him.

Thanks, and best regards,

Washington 5, D. C.

Dear Mr. Greene:

I am glad to hear from you and to get acquainted, at least by mail. Sea Dad Routh has mentioned you to me more than once, in the most glowing terms.

You are quite right not to let modesty influence your selection of subject for the Florina Lasker seminar; this field is modest enough, financially and professionally, without the practitioners adding more of their own.

Enclosed are a couple of items on SRC that should give you as much as you will want to bother with. The first is a brief history, as inserted into the Congressional Record by Senator Douglas. The other is a recent report on program activities, prepared for our annual meeting and for non-public use among our board members and friends.

Of course, if this leaves you with unanswered questions related to your theme, you have only to call on me for as much more exposition as you need.

I am asking our circulation clerk to enter a New South subscription in your name; a bill for $2.00 will be along eventually.

Until our paths cross, all good wishes.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Mr. Harold C. Fleming

Dear Mr. Fleming:

An (unfortunately) short-run associate of our buddy, Fred Routh, at the Michigan FEP Commission, I have within recent months come down to Washington as Area Director for the American Jewish Committee. If our old "Sea Dad" were still with SRC, I would, of course, direct this to him. However, because I do not know how many of the inner files he lifted when he fled to Michigan, I am soliciting your assistance.

As Fred did a year ago, it has fallen to me to lead a seminar of the Florina Lasker Fellows in Civil Liberties and Civil Rights at Brandeis University in Waltham, Massachusetts, in early February. This being the first seminar in the series, with perhaps unbecoming brashness, I have chosen to discuss "The Development, Function, Scope and Methodology of Intergroup Relations Agencies". In order to do an adequate, accurate and succinct job, this immodest act is going to require the assistance of some of my colleagues in the field. I wonder if it might be possible for you to have assembled some material on the origin and development of SRC? I have, in our Washington area office, Report No. L-1, of April 27, 1959, which is a darn good beginning for this purpose. I wonder if you might be able to supplement it in any way?

While I am writing let me ask if you would forward to this office a subscription form for "New South"?

With best personal wishes, and in the hope that we might be able to meet personally within the coming months,

Sincerely,

Bob Greene

Anti-Jewish Vandalism Reviewed and Explained

N.B.C. SALUTES AJC—TELECAST SET FOR 2 P.M. —WCKT CARRIES IT

Marking the dedication of the American Jewish Committee's new headquarters in New York City, the National Broadcasting Company will carry a special dramatic telecast on Susday, January 24.

The program will be viewed here in Miami over WCKT, beginning at 2 p.m. From advance reports, it should be one of the outstanding programs of the year.

The late Dr. Robert Lindner, author of "Rebel Without a Cause" and many technical papers in the field of individual and group psychology, wrote another best selling book before his untimely death.

From "The Fifty Minute Hour," N.B.C. will presest a full hour colorcast depicting an intriguing episode. Briefly, it's the story of a World War II storm trooper who is brought under the watchful eye of a staff psychologist (Dr. Lindner) at the Federal Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pa.

As the program unfolds, we'll see a strange relationship bind the Anti-Semite rabble rouser and the Jewish doctor. His illness is likened to "a blue print of an entire group of humanity."

His cure will grip you.

A Review of Events

PAINT SMEARED AROUND THE GLOBE

The world awoke on Christmas morning to read and hear of Anti-Semitic Vandalism that smacked of hate in its most primitive form.

A synagogue that had been dedicated by German Chancellor Adenauer only three months before had been scrawled upon in Cologne. The German prime minister immediately denounced the action but the die had been cast.

With blazing headlines, the news was flashed—in its wake, came a campaign of desecration that spread around the globe. Even Miami was a target of this evil ghost of Hitleristic activity.

Within days of the first incident, we heard of swastikas appearing on Jewish houses of worship and upon the doors of Jewish-owned shops in London, Paris, Oslo, Vienna, Glasgow, Melbourne and finally New York.

An organized plot? Some say it was, promoted by those sick mortals who consider themselves heirs of the Nazis in Germany, in the United States and elsewhere.

On the other hand, many believe that if the first gestures stemmed from such people, there was a follow-through by human animals who crave attention at the cost of others on an individual basis.

Later events have shown that once the spotlight has been turned away from these poor fools, they shrink into slumber once again.

Dr. S. Andhil Fineberg, in his Punishment Without Crime, substantiates this when he wrote:

"What is it the anti-Semite wants when he smears 'Down with the Jews' in a store window?

"That is vandalism. No matter what he has written, he has violated the law when he defaces a store window.

Does the offender want to be thought of as a common, sneaking vandal? No indeed. He wants it proclaimed that someone — and he hopes that the public will think it is many people—hates the Jews.

"What would be the best strategy then?

"Certainly it would be to apprehend him and pusish him for his vandalism, an offense which everyone condemns.

"How about advertising what he wrote on the window and publicizing it in the press? To do that would be to do exactly what the anti-Semite wants.

"A few people may have seen the defaced window. Many thousands would read of it in the newspaper.

"The more people to whom his creed is conveyed the better the hater likes it."

As the world came to grips with

An Editorial

WHAT'S THE USE ?

During the last two weeks, the Greater Miami Chapter of AJCommittee has taken hold of itself and has pushed forward along a number of fronts.

Under the able leadership of its president, Col. Nat Rood, both the Executive Committee and all the committee chairmen have faced up to the fact that renewed efforts are necessary, if the Chapter is to accomplish its manyfold missions.

But, the thought suddenly occured to us the other night, "What's the use?" No, we're not ready to pack our bag and move off to another camp. It's just that we have a feeling that this renewed zest on the part of leadership might be wasted.

In fact, it will be wasted unless our entire membership catches hold of this feeling of need and puts out something more than its annual dues from time to time.

Elsewhere in this issue, we carry stories about Chapter structure and self-evaluation via "brain-storming." We believe that it's high time that the whole Chapter reaches deep in its soul and comes up with some conclusive answers.

More and more, our Chapter is looked upon as a strong community force for good. This is commendable. But, leadership cannot carry the ball by itself. We need more Indians and many more potential Chiefs, if we are to accomplish all that is expected of us.

Question: "Are you willing to do your share?"

Further, "Are you interested enough in the Chapter to pitch in and get involved in committee work while bringing in new members who are ready to give time and energy to the causes which attract AJC attention?"

If the answer is positive, then we can lay aside our doubts as to the future of this Chapter.

Only time will tell.

With all of us prepared to maintain full steam, then the question "What's the Use?" is superfluous!

Youth Committee

KATZMAN REPORTS

Governor Collins has appointed James R. Katzman, Chairman of our Youth Committee, as a member of the Florida delegation to the White House Conference on Children and Youth to be held in Washington, D. C., March 26th through April 2nd. Jim brings up up to date on Conference plans and our role in it. ED. NOTE.

It is a source of much satisfaction to our Chapter that the national administration of AJC has warmly endorsed the "National Bill of Rights Year" proposal of the Miami Chapter to the Florida State Planning Conference of the White House Conference on Children and Youth.

National has transmitted this approval to all chapters with the recommendation that each chapter use its efforts with their state delegations to the end that this proposal be furthered at the forthcoming White House Conference on Children and Youth.

This proposal, which originated with our Chapter, calls for the President of the United States to proclaim a National Bill of Rights Year.

It offers, in our judgment, a tremendous potential where we can hope to reach our people through the mass media, and thus provide a nationwide reexamination of rededication to our basic freedoms.

If we can succeed in dramatizing to our nation the essential needs of humans to live in freedom and dignity, and the need for respect of such freedoms, it will focus attention on such problems as personal and group behavior, intergroup relations, education and good citizenship.

The White House Conference on Children and Youth will take place in Washington, D. C., March 26th thru April 2nd.

Change in Procedure

DECENTRALIZED LEADERSHIP ADOPTED

Col. Nat Rood, Chapter president, called all the committee chairmen together for a strategy conference.

From it has come a change in procedure which affects all the membership.

Each Chapter vice president has been given a number of committees to oversee. He and his committee chairmen have been given a wider range of authority and responsibility than ever before.

This means then that (1) the Executive Committee will be more concerned with policy making than implementation; and (2) there will be less pressure placed on the shoulders of Seymour Samet and his staff, as laymen will be expected to do many of the things they have pushed off into the hands of the staff previously.

This is a move that can only point to a stronger Chapter—people are most effective when they can move at will on an issue in which they are involved.

New leaders will emerge, fresh from the rigors of hard work in committees. The staff, under Seymour's direction, will be better able to service the Chapter as a whole rather than the individual needs of many groups.

We salute Col. Rood and his cohorts for coming up with an ambitious and fruitful program.

What's New????

THE CHAPTER'S ON THE GO

Charles Finkelstein, one of our hard working vice presidents, has announced a Workshop for all those who served as Captains and Interviewers for the Jewish Attitude Survey, which was recently completed.

It's scheduled for Thursday evening, January 28th, at the DuPont Plaza Hotel.

All the Chapter joins the entire community in offering a cordial and warm welcome to Arthur Rosichan, the new executive director of the Federation.

Harold Murray, national director of the Community Affairs Department, AJC, will visit our Chapter early in February. He will be especially interested in observing Chapter activities and hearing of this year's varied projects.

Seymour Samet attends the Southern Inter-Agency Conference in Atlanta this week. The Conference, whose members are all professionals in the field of human understanding, meets from time to time to discuss "tensions" and the ways to reduce them to proper proportion.

Seymour's next stop will be New York, for AJC's National Executive Committee Meeting.

Lee Ruwitch has his Mass Media Committee fired up. They met on the 12th and will again convene on the 27th. Serving with him are Jack I. Green, Allen I. Freehling, Charles Friedlander, Edward Cohen, Sanford Bacon, and Jack L. Sandler. All are mass media, advertising and public relations specialists.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE BRAINS PROBED

At the conclusion of this month's Executive Committee meeting, Jack Green took charge with tape recorder in hand.

He had been invited to lead a "brain-storming session" by chairman Harold B. Spaet. This is a technique used most often by advertising firms for coming up with the sensational ideas that they must produce.

For our purposes, Jack explained that the topic dealt with our Chapter and its role in 1960. From there, he encouraged the group to throw out ideas, no matter how wild-looking for quantity from which the best could be sifted via listening to the tape later.

Although there may have been too many people participating to make this a completely successful experiment, it was a noble gesture that should have some beneficial results.

The Executive Committee is interested in your views . . . if you had been at the meeting, what would you have suggested for AJC during the next 12 months? What would you criticize; what would you praise; what are the Chapter's most pressing problems; what are its greatest promises?

Let us hear from YOU—we need your comments!

Four Chapter Leaders Involved

PUERTO RICO EXTENDS BID TO AJC

The Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, concerned about human rights problems on the island and in the States, has invited AJC leaders to visit and confer.

As an outgrowth of this Chapter's determination to extend itself in Latin American affairs, and recognizing the important part Miami can play in solving mutual problems that beset both ends of this Hemisphere, the mission will include four (yet unnamed) delegates from our Chapter.

Others will come from New York, Boston, Cleveland, Detroit, Philadelphia and Newark.

Delegates will gain on-the-spot background understanding about Spanish-speaking immigrants, who have poured into the major cities on the Eastern seaboard. From this visit should come a series of practical solutions for solving the human relations problems that have cropped up.

Net Profits To JDA

NEMEROV SHOW AT FONTAINBLEAU

David Nemerov, world-famed painter, will exhibit sixty-two of his works at the Fontainbleau for two weeks, beginning January 30.

He will contribute the net profits from the show to the National Joint Defense Appeal, the fund-raising arm nationally for AJC and ADL.

Two of our members, Mrs. Richard (Elaine) Wolfson and Mrs. William (Jane) Finsten, previewed the paintings that will be sold when they accepted Nemerov's invitation to visit his West Palm Beach studios.

They were so intrigued and enthusiastic, that they agreed to assist him at the exhibit.

A committee was formed to help make the show a success. Among those who volunteered from the Chapter are Mesdames M. A. Baskin, Alfred Boas, Alvin Cassel, David Fleeman, Martin Fine, Charles Goldstein, Laura Goldstein, Morton Halpern, Arthur Horowitz, Jay I. Kislak, Bernard Kramarsky, Raymond Lewis, Alan Lipton, Van Myers and Alan S. Robinson.

One of his talented daughters, Renee Nemerov, will display her sculptures to complete the exhibit.

Progress in Understanding

LABOR LOWERS CIVIL RIGHTS BARRIERS

The "major barriers against significant civil rights progress in the United States are coming down at an accelerated pace," Herbert B. Ehrmann, President of the American Jewish Committee said when he announced the publication of a twelve year survey of civil rights progress in the United States entitled The People Take The Lead. The publication lists civil rights gains in government, armed forces, education, housing, employment, religion, unions and other voluntary organizations.

Labor's participation in this forward march, Mr. Ehrmann said, is evidenced by the 1959 AFL-CIO convention which urged all affiliates to end segregation in local unions and called on two railroad brotherhoods to drop the color bar in their constitutions. Earlier, the AFL-CIO had instructed all unions to include clauses barring racial discrimination in hiring, wages and promotions in all collective bargaining agreements.

The pamphlet also hails the creation of the AFL-CIO Southern Advisory Committee on Civil Rights by union leaders of Alabama, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia to implement union policy on state and local levels and convention action by the National Postal Transport Association, by better than a two-thirds vote, to amend its constitution to admit Negroes.

Mr. Ehrmann said that civil rights gains during the past year emphasize that "the American people, for the most part, are accepting the historic breakthrough of the past decade as an ever increasing reality of their daily lives." He added "Full fledged equality of opportunity is no longer a vision. It is rapidly emerging as a goal within reach."

The forty-two page report, published as the Committee's annual survey of legislative, administrative, judicial and voluntary civil rights advances in the United States, will be issued on Bill of Rights Day (December 15), which this year celebrates the 168th Anniversary of the Constitution's first ten amendments. The survey also marks the twelfth anniversary year of the President's Committee on Civil Rights (appointed by President Truman in 1947).

One of the major achievements covered in The People Take The Lead is the desegregation process in southern and border states in more than a thousand school districts and units as a result of the 1954 Supreme Court decision. The report states that "in the fall of 1959, the parade back to school was quiet and orderly for some three and a half million white and Negro children in school systems that have been or are gradually being desegregated."

On the national scene highlights of the report include these specific gains during 1959:

The United States Commission on Civil Rights made history with the first federal challenge of intimidation and evasions that have kept qualified Negro voters from the polls for over 50 years.

More than 23 million Americans in Ohio and California were protected by new Fair Employment Practice Laws.

Four states—Colorado, Connecticut, Massachusetts and Oregon—extended their laws for fair practices in housing to include the sale or rental of privately financed dwellings.

The People Take The Lead is available from the National Labor Service, Institute of Human Relations, 165 East 56th Street, New York 22, N. Y., at 25c per copy.

Remarks by Nathan Kushin

AN INSPIRED MESSAGE

(Ed. Note: Some time ago, our beloved Nathan Kushin addressed the Executive Committee. His message was so inspiring that we have taken excerpts from his remarks, knowing that our entire membership will gain much from them.)

I would like to give to you my own impressions of the leaders of the A.J.C.. And, would like to tell you how I came to join the A.J.C.

I managed to escape from the programs of 1903 and come to America. To make a living in America was difficult, but as soon as I began to earn a little money, a friend of mine called upon me to join the A.J.C.

He explained to me that the leading Jews of the U.S. were organizing this committee to guard Jewish interests all over the world. The Committee was headed by a millionaire philanthropist, Jacob Schiff; the outstanding Jewish lawyer in the U. S., Louis Marshall; and other Jewish leaders of the country. From Philadelphia, where I then lived, there were Cyrus Adler, the President of Dropsie College, a famous Jewish scholar; and Judge Myer Sultzburger. I was satisfied to trust Jacob Schiff with my $10.00 per year; satisfied that the money would not be squandered. To have the great Louis Marshall represent me not only in the U.S. but all over the world for a $10.00 retainer I felt was a good investment and so I joined the A.J.C.

After I moved to Miami, my friend Dr. Joseph Weidberg asked me to join the Chapter here which was then just being organized. He asked for a $15.00 check. I knew the price had been $10.00 for years, but I did not want to argue so I let him make a five-dollar commission. Since I play pinochle with him on Saturday nights and he's a poor player, I was sure I'd have no trouble getting my $5.00 back

A few years later I received a letter from Vice-Mayor Spaet, asking me to contribute $50.00 towards a dinner and symposium. I did not know that Miami Beach had a special Mayor for Vice, but I contributed the money and attended the dinner and symposium. It was a revelation to me—the intelligent discussions of the panelists and the inspiring address of Mr. Morris Abram of Atlanta.

Last year, Alvin Cassel asked me to attend a Regional Meeting of AJC in New Orleans. There I sat, listening to the flower of the Jewish communities of the South—professional men, business men, young and vigorous men; idealists interested in the welfare of the Jew everywhere. These men assembled here were probably 3rd and 4th generation Americans. They were born and bred in a free country and had not experienced the pains and agonies of persecution as I had in Russia. Still, they came to give of their talent and their time.

After attending the meetings, I concluded that my eyes had met the finest brains of Jewry; my ears had heard the finest rational discussion of the difficult times we Jews are going through and my heart had felt the warmth of the hearts of our leaders: our President, Mr. Engel and his brother, Mr. Bluestein, Dr. Weil, Dr. Samuel, Mr. Strook and all of the others. It was an inspiration to me to have attended these meetings. In my mind's eye, I can see in the faces of Mr. Bluestein and Mr. Engel the face of my guardian angel of long ago, Moses Montifiore.

I can tell you, we have competent and good people who are devoting their time, talent and courage to represent the Jewish cause all over the world. I am convinced that the best bargain available to every Jew is a membership in the A.J.C.—it is a good investment.

N.B.C. SALUTES AJC—

If at all possible, we suggest that you not only tell your friends to watch the program, but that you invite some over to view it and then discuss it.

Your comments about the presentation would be gratefully received by the Chapter Office.

Remember, that's THIS SUNDAY, JANUARY 24th, WCKT, CHANNEL 7, 2 O'CLOCK—as a salute to the Institute of Human Relations—A SPECIAL N.B.C. PERFORMANCE.

ANTI-JEWISH VANDALISM

the cancerous problem, and it only took a few days, the stories of these poisonous acts were shunted back in newspapers across countries. Also, authorities were able to arrest elements whose past history had left a path leading to the current smearings.

Thus, there was a two-pronged attack: (1) taking away the publicity that the smearers sought and (2) capturing those who had worked on orders from organizations.

What happened here in Miami? As the tide of paint was spreading, there was wide-spread concern that Miami's synagogues would be attacked by vandals en mass.

Those groups that had worked together with police authorities a few years before, when houses of worship were rocked by explosions, set up their lines of communications once again. Greater Miami was ready for the problem before it arrived.

Because of this, there was a minimum amount of trouble, as the community stood up, determined to discourage the vandals before they tried their hand at desecration.

Needless to say, AJC did its share in this adventure, pitted the healthy against the ill.

My dear Governor Collins:

I wonder whether you had had the opportunity of reading the enclosed report entitled, "The Negro and the Ballot in the South," by Margaret Price, when you made the comments you did the other day to the effect that there was no problem concerning Negro voting in Florida.

As I recall, the statement attributed to you which appeared in The Miami Herald indicated that you felt the report of the National Civil Rights Commission on the matter of Negro voting rights in Florida did not constitute a real problem for our State.

I would call your attention to pages 64 and 65 of the enclosed report. I have marked some of the figures which appear the most startling in the report. Lafayette which lists a total population of 200 Negroes had no registered Negro voters. Liberty County with a Negro population of 600 had no registered Negro voters. Union County with a population of 3500 Negroes had no registered Negro voters. All these figures are for the year 1958. In Flagler County only 19 Negroes out of 1500 were registered. In Gadsden County there were only 7 Negroes registered out of a population of 28,400. Assuming that these figures are accurate, the report must certainly indicate that something is radically wrong. What that may be or what combination of things it might be is a matter which ought to be ascertained prior to our next elections.

In any case, I would appreciate having any comments you would care to offer on the report and the statistics listed therein.

Respectfully yours,

Just a note to express my appreciation for your graciousness in providing the material I have used in preparing my presentation for the Lasker Fellows. Even more, I'd like you to know of my gratitude for your encouraging remarks and incisive comment about the current status of the field.

SRC has had my continuing professional respect and insofar as my sorties into Virginia permit, I hope to cooperate with your operative there. REACTIONS TO THE OUTBREAK OF SWASTIKAS

More than two months have passed since the Christmas daubing of the Cologne synagogue. The ensuing epidemic of swastikas here and abroad has declined sharply. It is now possible to examine in detail some of the varied reactions to the furor.

Hatemongers

Belittling the gravity of the incidents, anti-Semitic propagandists in the United States suggest by and large that "the Jews themselves did it." A recent issue of Conde McGinley's Common Sense sets the line bluntly:

> To deface synagogue doors with paint is a useless, foolish thing. It is the wrong way. In some localities it is just what the Jews want, and it is not unlikely that they themselves have done this. They have done it before. . .

A newsletter from racist Frank L. Britton of Inglewood, Calif., goes to even greater extremes:

> All this hysteria and frenzy because a few dozen individuals, most of them pranksters and juvenile mischief-makers, daubed a little paint on a few synagogue walls. . . and yet as silly and absurd as all this hysteria may > seem, it should be noted that these are the self-same tactics which international Jewry used 20 years ago to arouse the entire world into a holy crusade against "nazi" Germany.

James H. Madole, in the February National Renaissance Bulletin, describes "The Big Swastika Hoax" as an "unprecedented wave of propaganda. . . triggered by the press agents of International Zionism." He sets forth the "real purposes" behind the outbreak:

> World Jewry wishes to keep Germany divided as a slave-colony for the state of Israel and foreign corporations and stockholders who control the purse-strings of Germany's alleged "business boom."

Marilyn R. Allen, Utah anti-Semitic pamphleteer, dismissed the incidents as "all this 'anti-Semitic' nonsense" in an article published by the racist weekly, Georgia Tribune. She urges that "CRIME and real criminals" be persecuted with the same vehemence used against "poor little youthful 'anti-Semites,' who do nothing more violent than paint swastikas or make cracks about the Jews."

Arab and Pro-Arab Spokesmen Both in the U.S. and abroad, Arab publications interpret the swastika furor in the manner which best serves their own propagandistic aims.

Al Ahram, Cairo's leading daily newspaper, refers to an alleged meeting in Israel of a high-level "planning council for the sale of Israel bonds," and then makes the following charge:

> . . . Israel, without feeling ashamed and without trying to conceal its actions, had exposed the true motives that made it resort to the swastika plot in order to frighten European Jews and make them consider emigrating to Israel, and to persuade world Jewish communities to finance their emigration to Israel.

The Caravan, an English-language Arab weekly published in Brooklyn, featured in February a series of articles by Dr. Fayez al Sayegh, long an official spokesman for the Arab Information Center. The series blames the epidemic on the refusal of the Cologne rabbi to have the painted swastika removed immediately from his synagogue. The decision was made, according to Sayegh, "with forethought and deliberation, and with fore-knowledge of the consequences." The rabbi, he alleges, was an Israeli citizen, who "nurses a grudge against the Nazi regime" and was advised by "Jews (certainly Zionist Jews) from outside Germany." Dr. Sayegh concludes that the Zionists emerged as the "supreme beneficiaries" of these incidents. He lists others who also profited from the glare of publicity -- neo-Nazis, hate-peddlers, communists and "certain interests in England."

Religious Spokesmen In sharp contrast is the heartening reaction of church groups and clergy, who universally condemned these incidents and emphasized the threat posed to all faiths. Statements by religious leaders are far too numerous to review in detail; those quoted here are representative of a widespread and spontaneous response.

The Bishops of the Administrative Board of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, through the Most Rev. Karl J. Alter, called on "all citizens, whether Christians or Jews," to "protest privately and publicly against further manifestation of bigotry," and deplored "any revival of the anti-Semitic prejudice which in its earlier manifestation culminated in such terrible disaster."

The World Council of Churches, Geneva organization representing 171 Protestant, Anglican and Orthodox denominations and groups, expressed the hope that "this dangerous recrudescence of anti-Semitism may be suppressed from the outset." The Council statement also regretted that "after all the Jewish people have gone through in recent times, once again they should become the target of mischievous anti-Semitic propaganda."

The United Lutheran Church denounced the incidents as "anti-Christian as well as anti-Jewish." At its annual meeting, the National Lutheran Council called on members "to condemn all irresponsible acts of violence and vandalism aimed at robbing religious or racial groups or individuals of their dignity as children of God."

Many clergymen echoed the thought of Archbishop Iakovos, Primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, who declared:

> I think that this situation should alarm us Christians all over the world. Instead of talking sometimes just to make headlines we must work very conscientiously and responsively so that we may get back some order in our Christian thinking, in our Christian living and our society throughout the world.

THE KU KLUX KLAN -- HERE AND ABROAD

A recent excerpt from The Fiery Cross, Klan publication issued in Dallas, Tex.:

> The Klan restricts its membership to native born, white Protestant, Gentile (Caucasion) American citizens. When you enter one of our Klaverns you know there is not a Roman Catholic nor a Jew in there. . . We will keep it that way, God helping us.

A KKK-sponsored private school will be built in Atlanta, according to Lee Davidson, Grand Dragon of the Georgia Klan. . . After a weekend meeting, Imperial Wizard H. J. Jones of Jonesboro, Ga., on February 29 announced that his Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, Inc. -- allegedly consolidating 42,000 independent Klansmen from 17 states -- would launch a 30-state recruiting drive. Among areas to be visited by organizers are New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware. . . A robed but unmasked Klansman paraded on the main street of Rock Hill, S. C., on March 1, visiting two variety stores that have been targets of lunch-counter sitdown protests by Negro students. . . A chapter of the KKK has allegedly been established in Buenos Aires province under the direction of "Grand Dragon A-1." . . . According to Austrian police, a secret Nazi underground group recently uncovered in Vienna had close links with the KKK in the United States and with an international fascist movement centered in Sweden.

ROCKWELL ASSERTS HIS "RIGHTS"

George Lincoln Rockwell, after establishing headquarters in Arlington, Va., for his American Nazi Party, was discharged because of his "civilian activities" from the naval reserve early last month; he had held the rank of commander. On February 8, Rockwell and a deputy leader, J. V. Kenneth Morgan, were on a Washington, D.C., street corner, preparing to distribute handbills which, among other things, advocate gas chambers for Jews. They were approached by Irving Berman, who objected to the pamphlets and tried to grab them. During the ensuing scuffle, Morgan and Berman were taken into custody by police.

Rockwell immediately obtained the help of the American Civil Liberties Union to protect his right to free speech. Corporation Counsel Chester H. Gray of the District of Columbia ruled that District officials are not empowered to halt distribution of hate literature; although "offensive, insulting and abusive, it is not obscene and does not violate District libel laws." Exploiting the situation, Rockwell announced on February 24 that he will hold a mass anti-Semitic rally on the grounds of the Washington Monument; he has filed an application with the U. S. Department of Interior for formal permission to use the monument grounds for an open-air meeting in April.

We enclose a Summary and Analysis of Federal Civil Rights Act of 1960. This new law supplements the 1957 Civil Rights Act and also explores new aspects of the civil rights field. Its various provisions deal with (1) voting registrars, (2) voting records, (3) enforcement of court orders, (4) schools for children of servicemen, (5) FBI intervention in bombings of communal and other buildings, and (6) the powers of the Civil Rights Commission.

The bill was signed by President Eisenhower today and goes into effect immediately.

THE FEDERAL CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1960

A SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

The "Civil Rights Act of 1960" was adopted by the United States Senate on April 8 and by the House of Representatives on April 21. It will go into effect immediately upon its signature by the President.

The new law supplements the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and also explores new aspects of the civil rights field. The bill was subjected to many cross currents during the course of its passage through Congress. Many of its original provisions were eliminated and some new clauses were inserted with little discussion during the course of the debates. Because events moved so rapidly and because not all actions taken with regard to the bill received publicity, it is essential to set forth just what the final version of the bill contains.

This Report summarizes the new law and briefly analyzes its significant provisions. No effort is made to assess the struggle that preceded enactment or the concessions that were made by either side, except insofar as they throw light on what the Act finally provides.

The provisions of the 1960 Act deal with (1) voting registrars (Title 6), (2) voting records (Title 3), (3) enforcement of court orders (Title 1), (4) schools for children of servicemen (Title 5), (5) FBI intervention in bombings of communal and other buildings (Title 2), and (6) the powers of the Civil Rights Commission (Title 4). The seventh title contains the customary provision that, if any provision of the Act is held invalid, the remainder of the Act shall not be affected thereby.

I. VOTING - REFEREES

A. General

Title 6 of the Act -- the voting referee provision -- is generally regarded as the "heart" of the new law. The 1957 Civil Rights Act empowered the Attorney General to bring suit to enforce the right to vote. Title 6 can come into play if a suit is brought against government officials under the 1957 Act. If the court finds, in such a suit, that a person has been deprived of his voting rights on account of race or color, the Attorney General may request the court to find further that the deprivation was pursuant to a "pattern or practice." If the court finds such a pattern or practice, any other person of that race or color will be entitled to apply to the court for an order declaring him qualified to vote if he is qualified under state law and if, since the finding of the pattern or practice, he has been denied the right to register or vote. If the court grants the order, the person must then be allowed to vote in primary as well as general elections and in state and local as well as Federal elections. Refusal by election officials to allow such a person to vote will constitute contempt of court.

In deciding whether or not to grant such orders, the court may appoint a qualified voter of the judicial district as a referee to take evidence. The referee will then report his findings as to the qualifications of the applicants and deprivation of their voting rights. This evidence will be obtained in ex parte proceedings; that is, only the applicant's side will be heard. However, state officials may challenge the findings within ten days after they have been reported to the court.

This general outline of Title 6 may serve as a background for the discussion in the following pages of its specific provisions, some of which threaten to reduce its value substantially.

B. Scope

The 1957 Civil Rights Act amended the law originally passed in 1870 dealing with discrimination in elections. That law applied to all elections and prohibited discrimination by state authorities on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. The 1957 Act added a new provision prohibiting interference with the right to vote by private individuals as well as state officials. This provision is not limited to discrimination based on race or color. However, it applies only to Federal elections. The 1957 Act further provided that the Attorney General could bring suits to enjoin violations of either the old 1870 statute or the new provision just described.

The provisions of Title 6 of the 1960 Act apply only when a suit is brought by the Attorney General to enjoin discrimination of the sort prohibited by the 1870 statute; that is, discrimination by state authorities based on race or color. This means it will not be available in either (1) suits to enjoin discrimination by private individuals, even in Federal elections, or (2) suits to enjoin discrimination by state officials based on other matters, such as religion or national origin. This would bar action under Title 6 in the case of exclusion of Americans of Mexican descent in the Southwest, although an effort might be made to show that such discrimination was really based on "race" or "color."

C. Finding of Pattern or Practice

Under the new law, the Attorney General will have to exercise his discretion twice before the voting referee provisions are invoked. Thus, even after an individual is found who is prepared to be the subject of a suit brought by the Attorney General, the latter will first have to decide whether to bring a suit under the 1957 Law. If he does so and wins it, he will then have to decide whether to ask the court to make a finding that there is a pattern or practice of discrimination. Once he invokes this provision, the court must make a finding.

It might be added that this section will probably be attacked as invalid under the constitutional provision which limits the Federal courts to consideration of actual "cases or controversies." Debates in Congress indicate that it will be argued that it is not necessary for the decision of the case under the 1957 Act to make a finding as to a pattern or practice of discrimination. Presumably it will be urged that this is a separate, abstract issue which the courts cannot decide.

D. The Affected Area

For the purpose of Title 6, a pattern or practice must be shown to exist "within the affected area." In other words, if the suit is brought against an election official who has jurisdiction over a whole county, the pattern or practice can be shown for the whole county and the referee provisions can be invoked for the whole county.

However, Southern legislatures may use this provision to hamper the Attorney General in invoking this Title. If the state sets up separate registration agencies for each election district or other small voting unit, the Attorney General might be required to show the existence of a discriminatory practice in each such unit. This would materially increase the efforts needed to prove the existence of a pattern or practice of discrimination. It would also reduce the usefulness of any such finding since it would be effective in only a small part of the state.

E. Obligations of the Applicant

Once the court has found that a discriminatory pattern exists, any member of the same race or color may apply for a court order allowing him to register or vote. Such an applicant must show that he meets the state law requirements for voting. He must also show that he has been denied opportunity to register or vote by a state official subsequent to the court's finding of a discriminatory practice. (It appears that he does not have to show that this denial was part of a pattern of discrimination or an effort to discriminate.) A few comments may be made on this provision.

1. Special effort was made in this statute to simplify the procedure for proving an applicant's qualification to vote. Only the applicant is heard during the proceedings before the referee. His statement under oath is treated as prima facie evidence as to his age, residence and prior efforts to register. Where the state law requires proof of literacy or understanding of designated subjects, the referee and the court are to base their decision on the answers that the applicant gives to the referee.

It is particularly important that Congress did not adopt the proposal of the Southern bloc that state officials be allowed to participate in the hearing before the referee. Their presence would undoubtedly have had an intimidating effect.

2. Much of the discrimination against Negroes in voting in the South consists of illegally allowing whites to vote rather than illegally excluding Negroes. In other words, the states adopt severe registration requirements and then apply them strictly to Negroes but not to whites. Title 6 applies only when the applicant is qualified to vote under state law. If this were all, strict state requirements would still bar many Negroes.

The Act deals with this problem by providing that the applicant need not prove "qualifications more stringent than those used" by the election officials involved in the case. Thus, the test to be used is the standard actually used for whites in the community. However, the burden may be on the applicant to convince the referee that he should not follow the strict language of the state statute.

3. The requirement that an application must be made after the court's finding of a discriminatory pattern may make it difficult to get willing applicants. The ever-present danger of social, economic and even physical pressures already operates to restrain Negroes in the deep South from attempting to vote and from filing complaints with the Department of Justice or the courts. Those areas where a court's finding of a discriminatory pattern has been made will be particularly sensitive to the issue and prepared to take steps to "discourage" Negro applicants. This factor is likely to reduce the number of Negroes prepared to take advantage of Title 6.

4. A state may have only one brief registration period each year. If the court's finding of a discriminatory pattern is issued shortly after the end of such a period, an applicant would have to wait almost a year before filing an application with state officials. The wording of the Act could be construed to mean that he would have to wait until such an application was denied before invoking Title 6. However, a colloquy on the floor of the House of Representatives between Congressmen Lindsay and Celler of New York and O'Hara of Michigan immediately prior to House action on April 21 suggests that the court may have authority to allow the applicant to register even if he did not apply to state officials after the court handed down its original finding of a pattern of discrimination. 1/

1/ In response to Lindsay's question on the subject, O'Hara stated, "when a court finds a pattern or practice of discrimination it has also, in effect, found that it would have been futile for the applicant to have attempted to register at any time prior thereto, and, if registration has already closed, the applicant has had no opportunity to meet any such requirement after the finding of a pattern or practice of discrimination. Since this is a suit in equity, equitable doctrines should apply, including the rule that persons asking relief need not have attempted a clearly futile act as a condition precedent to receiving relief. This principle was recognized during the Senate debate." Celler then stated that particular attention should be paid to "the colloquy between the gentlemen who now has the floor /O'Hara/ and the gentleman from New York /Lindsay/, because it would be the criteria that will govern the courts in their interpretation of these sections."

5. A state may adopt a system of permanent registration and blanket in all persons already registered. In the deep South this would mean whites, with only a very few Negroes. Additional registration could then be limited to a short period each year, as little as part of one day. Since such a provision would apply equally to all voters, without distinction based on race, it might not be open to attack under this law. However, it might be argued that such a law was discriminatory because its effect is to continue the results of past discrimination.

F. Judicial Review

Each finding by the referee that an individual is entitled to register or vote may be challenged by state officials within ten days after the referee's finding has been reported to the court. If the court rules in favor of the applicant, the state can, of course, appeal the decision in the same way that any court decision can be appealed. It is quite likely that most decisions favorable to applicants will be appealed, if only for purposes of delay. (Furthermore, as noted at the outset, this whole title comes into play only after a court has found discrimination in a proceeding to enforce the law. Since any such finding can be appealed, there may be a delay of a year or two before the referee provisions can be invoked.)

An effort is made to reduce the effect of delays by providing that, where an application for the right to vote has been made at least 20 days before an election and this application has not been determined by the date of the election, the court shall issue an order authorizing the applicant to vote provisionally. Where the application was filed less than 20 days before the election, the court may in its discretion issue such an order. In either case, the applicant must be allowed to vote, but his ballot must be impounded pending determination of the application.

In using this provision, the applicant need not show that he was deprived of the right to vote after the court's finding of a pattern of discrimination. However, he must show that he is qualified to vote under state law. It is not clear how this provision will work.[2/]

G. Enforcement

Once the court has issued an order to election officials declaring that an applicant is qualified to vote, that applicant must be allowed to vote. (The Act does not appear to take account of occurrences subsequent to the court's decision but prior to election day which would normally work to deprive a person of his right to vote, e.g. change of residence or conviction of a felony.) Violation of the court's order can be prosecuted as contempt of court.

The court is not limited to issuing orders requiring state officials to allow applicants to vote. It may also take any other action it deems necessary to enforce its decrees and it may authorize referees to take such action. The legislative history of the Act makes it clear that this includes orders permitting referees or their representatives to be present at polling places.

2/ The requirement that the applicant show that he is qualified in order to be eligible for a provisional voting order is required by the following statutory language: "Providing, however, that such applicant shall be qualified to vote under State law." The brief debate in the House on April 21, immediately prior to its vote finally approving the Act, indicated that it is merely necessary that it appear that the applicant is qualified under state law. The court need not have made a finding that that the applicant is qualified. Apparently, the court will decide whether it appears that the applicant is qualified on the basis of the applicant's statements to the referee and the referee's report, if the latter is available. Presumably, the court will authorize such provisional voting except in those cases where the applicant is clearly not qualified, e.g., if he is obviously below voting age or if the referee has discovered overwhelming evidence that any other proper state qualification has not been complied with. Of course, the further provision in the statute directing the court to make appropriate provision for the impounding of the applicant's ballot in the event of provisional voting will protect the right of the state should the applicant ultimately be found not to be qualified.

H. Resignations

In some areas in the South, efforts were made to nullify the 1957 Act by having local registrars resign their positions as fast as they were sued or threatened with suit. As long as their posts were left vacant, there was no one in control of the registration or voting process. Hence, there was no one against whom a court order could be issued. To deal with this problem, the 1960 Act provides that if election officials resign and are not replaced, the action may be brought against the state itself.

II. VOTING RECORDS

Title 3 of the Act requires election officials to retain and preserve all Federal election records for at least 22 months. It was prompted by the fact that a number of election officials destroyed their records after the 1957 Act was passed in order to prevent proof of discrimination.

Any election official who wilfully violates this provision and anyone who steals or alters such records will be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of up to $1,000 or imprisonment for up to one year or both. The Attorney General may compel election officials to make such records available to him or his representatives. However, he is limited in the public use that he may make of the information he obtains. He may disclose it to Congress, its committees and governmental agencies and may present it in any case or proceeding before a court or grand jury.

Although the law applies only to Federal election records, this is not a significant limitation. Voters are ordinarily required to register only once for both Federal and state elections. It is therefore enough to protect their right to register in Federal elections.

Since the criminal penalties provided by this section are not great enough to make a violation a felony, prosecutions can be instituted by an information sworn to by the Federal district attorney. This avoids the difficulty of obtaining an indictment from a Southern grand jury. However, the defendant will have to be tried before a petit jury drawn from his own locality before he can be convicted.

III. COURT ORDERS

Title 1 of the bill makes it a crime to interfere "by threats or force" with the exercise of rights or the performance or duties under any Federal court order. Violators are subject to a fine of up to $1,000 or imprisonment for up to one year or both.

Originally, this title of the bill was aimed only at interference with court orders relating to desegregation of public schools. It was prompted by activities of private individuals in Nashville, Tenn., Hoxie, Ark., and other areas where court desegregation orders had been issued. Their activities were designed to discourage Negroes from asserting their right to go to formerly white schools and to discourage school officials from complying with such requests. It was broadened to apply to all court orders by a coalition of Southerners and conservative Republicans, apparently with a view to its possible use against labor unions.

There is a specific provision in this title that injunctions against violation of or interference with court orders shall not be denied because this title makes such activities a crime. This clause is necessitated by the fact that courts do not ordinarily enjoin the commission of a crime.

As in the case of Title 3, the limited penalties provided in this title eliminate the necessity of a grand jury indictment.

IV. EDUCATION

Title 5 is aimed at school closings designed to frustrate desegregation orders. It authorizes the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to provide free education for children of members of the Armed Forces on active duty if local public schools are made unavailable to them by state or local governmental authority.

These provisions take the form of amendments to the existing laws that provide in various ways for Federal schools, or for Federal assistance to local schools, for different categories of "Federally-connected children." This means children of members of the Armed Forces, of civilians working on Federal posts, and of families brought into an area because of greatly increased Federal defense activities.

The new provisions, however, are very limited. They apply only to children of servicemen on active duty, living on or off Federal posts. If the schools they attend are closed down by a state, Title 5 will permit the Health Department to provide minimum schooling facilities on a temporary basis. Although the bill is not limited to situations where the school closing is part of an effort to avoid desegregation, that is the only situation in which the provision is likely to be invoked.

Title 5 was part of the Administration's original civil rights package. Two other aspects of this part of the package were dropped out of the bill before final enactment. One would have allowed the Department of Health to secure possession of local school buildings originally constructed with Federal funds. The other would have required assurances from local officials that schools built in the future with Federal funds would be made available to the Commissioner if the schools were closed by state or local action.

V. BOMBINGS

Title 2 of the Act grew out of the bombing and burning of synagogues and homes of Negro leaders in the past few years. It is designed to give the Federal government a clear mandate to start an investigation of such a bombing as soon as it occurs. In the past, the F.B.I. has often declined to act because there was no apparent violation of Federal law.

The first section of this title penalizes flight across state lines to avoid prosecution or giving testimony in relation to damage or destruction of any buildings, including dwellings. A fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, are provided as penalties for violation of this section.

This provision, recommended by the Eisenhower Administration, was regarded as too narrow to do the job needed. Hence, additional provisions were added forbidding the interstate transportation of explosives with the knowledge or intent that they will be used to damage or destroy buildings or to interfere with the use of such buildings for educational, religious, charitable, residential, business, or civic objectives. A graduated set of maximum penalties is provided, depending on whether personal injury, or death, results from such bombings. If death results, the court may, on recommendation of the jury, impose the death penalty. (Earlier versions of the bill would have applied only to synagogues, churches, schools and other institutional buildings. The inclusion of residences was a significant improvement because it made the bill apply to the destruction of homes of Negro leaders, which has been a conspicuous feature of the wave of bombings.)

In order to facilitate the prompt entry of the F.B.I. into bombing cases, it is provided that anyone in possession of explosives with the intent to use them to destroy or damage any building is presumed to have transported them in interstate commerce. This presumption is rebuttable and no person may be convicted under this section unless there is independent evidence that this section was violated.

In addition, it is made a crime punishable by a $1,000 fine or not more than one year imprisonment, or both, to use the mail, telephone, or telegraph to convey a threat or false warning of any such bombing.

Finally, this Title provides that enactment of this provision by Congress shall not invalidate state laws on the same subject. This is done to prevent application of the doctrine of "pre-emption" under which a Federal law is sometimes viewed as replacing and invalidating state laws in the same area.

VI. CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Title 4 grants each member of the Civil Rights Commission, created by the 1957 Civil Rights Act, the power to administer oaths and take statements of witnesses. Under the 1957 Act, only the Commission Chairman could swear in witnesses. The change will allow simultaneous hearings in various parts of the country, held by individual members of the six-man Commission.

CONCLUSION

The many compromises made in the 1960 Civil Rights Act before it emerged with the approval of Congress raise substantial doubts as to how much will be accomplished under its terms. It may be that, from the viewpoint of history, its chief significance will be that it again demonstrated that civil rights legislation can be enacted by Congress.

When the extremely limited Civil Rights Act of 1957 finally won its way through Congress, one might have exprected a relaxation among civil rights forces and a weakening in the demand for effective legislation. Instead, supporters of such legislation appear rather to have been encouraged to demand further action. The same may be true of the 1960 bill.

Any benefits accruing from the bill will of course be welcome. If, on the other hand, it soon appears that it contains too many crippling provisions to be effective, it will be impossible to prevent further action by Congress.

Subject: A Summary and Analysis of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Decisions of the United States Supreme Court

We enclose herewith the fourth in our annual series of summaries and analyses of the decisions of the Supreme Court, handed down during the 1959-1960 Term, in the field of civil rights and civil liberties.

Perhaps, the most striking feature was the continuation of the 5-4 split between the conservative and liberal wings which was solidified during the previous Term.

We trust you will find this Summary and Analysis interesting and useful.

INTRODUCTION

This Summary and Analysis, the fourth in an annual series, covers 53 decisions of the United States Supreme Court handed down during the 1959-1960 Term, that may be classified as dealing with civil rights or civil liberties; 35 of these cases are analyzed in some detail.

The most striking feature of the Term was the continuation of the clear five to four split between the conservative and liberal wings that had solidified during the previous Term. This division appeared in nine, and in only slightly modified form in another two, of the 35 cases analyzed here. A recent study of the work of the Court as a whole during the past year, not confined to civil rights and civil liberties cases, shows that the same division in the Court pervaded almost every sphere of its concern.

The polarity of the Court was most consistent in the five cases involving persons associated in some way with Communist activities in which a decision on the merits was reached. In all of these cases, Justices Frankfurter, Clark, Harlan, Whittaker and Stewart voted adversely to the individual involved. Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan dissented in all (except one in which the Chief Justice did not participate).

Another development during the year was a break in the unanimity that the Court had shown in past years in dealing with racial discrimination cases. However, the divisions that arose in some of the civil rights cases were mostly over procedural issues and not on the basic question of equality.

Outstanding features of the Term included, on the one hand:

> The unanimous decisions in three cases upholding the powers given to the Attorney General in the 1957-1960 Civil Rights Acts to bring suits to protect the right of Negroes to vote.
> The unanimous reaffirmation in Bates v. Little Rock of the 1958 decision in NAACP v. Alabama protecting NAACP membership lists against exposure.

The six to three decision in the Talley case invalidating an ordinance prohibiting distribution of anonymous handbills.

The unanimous decision in Smith v. California invalidating an ordinance making it a crime to possess obscene literature.

The three decisions barring the use of court martial proceedings against civilian employees and dependents of members of the armed forces abroad.

The decisions in the Rios and Elkins cases barring the use in federal trials of evidence illegally obtained by state officials.

On the other side of the ledger were:

The Flemming case, upholding the denial of social security benefits to persons deported because of membership in the Communist Party.

The Nelson decision, permitting the discharge of a non-civil service employee because of his refusal to answer questions about his membership in the Communist Party on the ground of self-incrimination.

The Niukkanen decision upholding deportation of an alien for long past membership in the Communist Party.

A number of decisions restricting the rights of persons involved in criminal proceedings.

None of these decisions can be described as marked departures from precedent. This may be attributed to the fact that the group of five Justices that dominates the Court is basically committed to the policy of limiting decisions in the constitutional area to as narrow a scope as possible. Hence, while the Court rejected a number of opportunities to broaden constitutional guarantees, it did not seriously undermine any. Neither did it overturn past libertarian decisions (with the possible exception of the effect of the Nelson case on the Slochower decision). There is still no reason to believe that the Court, as presently constituted, would fail to stand firm against any substantial inroads on our basic liberties.

In our report on the 1958-1959 Term, we noted that the decisions of that year seemed slightly more conservative than those of the preceding year which, in turn, were similarly to the right of those of 1956-1957. The decisions of the recent Term do not show a continuation of that trend. The Court may be described today as being at dead center, a fact that reflects its present close division. A change in its personnel could bring about a substantial change in its operations.

Very little was heard during this past year from the outspoken critics of the Court who, in the past, have insistently called for Congressional action to curb its powers. Bills for this purpose made no progress in Congress during the year.

The following Analysis consists of two parts. First, we give brief descriptions of the cases decided by the Court in the area of civil rights and civil liberties. Second, we present an analysis of the votes of the individual Justices during the Term.

SUMMARY OF CASES DECIDED

We discuss the Court's decisions on civil rights and civil liberties under five major headings: (1) "Civil Rights," which covers cases dealing with racial discrimination; (2) "Internal Security," which includes not only cases arising under security laws but all other cases involving persons charged with Communist affiliations; (3) "Freedom of Expression," which includes freedom of association, speech and religion; (4) "Immigration and Nationality;" and (5) "Other Criminal Proceedings," which covers cases, not included in the previous headings, in which the parties raised such questions as self-incrimination, double jeopardy, forced confessions and the right to counsel.

With only a few exceptions, we cover here cases in which the Court granted a hearing and reached a decision on the merits. In a number of the cases described, no opinions were written but the Court's disposition of the matter nevertheless established legal principles. We have not attempted to cover the many rulings declining to hear cases (by dismissing an appeal or denying a petition for writ of certiorari) except where such action seemed significant. In the area of civil rights, however, where these rulings reflect to some extent the policies of the Court, they have been treated in some detail.

I. CIVIL RIGHTS

A. Voting

The Supreme Court issued several decisions during the past Term interpreting the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 dealing with the right to vote. In United States v. Raines, 80 S. Ct. 519, the Court unanimously upheld the key section of that Act, which added a number of paragraphs to an 1870 law protecting the right to vote. The original law declared that all otherwise quali- citizens should be allowed to vote in any state or local election without regard to race. One of the sections added in 1957 empowered the United States Attorney General to bring suits in the name of the United States to restrain violations of the 1870 law.

The present action was brought by the Attorney General against the registrars of Terrell County, Georgia, for discriminating against Negroes who wanted to register and vote in a state election. The defendants moved to dismiss on the ground that the legislation was unconstitutional. The Federal District Judge granted this motion. He noted that the Federal Government has power to prevent racial discrimination by state officials but not by private persons. He interpreted the 1870 law as applying to private action as well as to official action. This, he said, made the whole statute unconstitutional. The government appealed from the District Court directly to the United States Supreme Court.

In an opinion by Justice Brennan, the Court held that the statute was clearly constitutional in its application to the defendants here, since they were all state officials. Hence, it was improper for the Court to consider whether the statute might be unconstitutional in other applications. The lower court had relied on a number of cases invalidating statutes because some aspects were unconstitutional. The Court reviewed these cases in detail. It found many of them inapplicable and suggested that the rest were no longer valid authority.

The defendants also argued that Congress did not have power to authorize the United States to enforce private constitutional rights. The Court replied that the "highest public interest" in the observance of the constitutional guarantees of private individuals is sufficient reason for Congress to act as it did.

Justice Frankfurter added a brief concurrence, in which Justice Harlan joined, saying that he believed the law was constitutional under familiar principles and that it was therefore not necessary to review the many cases "that may generally touch on, but do not govern, the issues now before us."

On the same day that it decided the Raines case, the Court issued a brief per curiam opinion in United States v. Thomas, 80 S. Ct. 612, a voting case arising in Louisiana. This case was also initiated by the Department of Justice under the 1957 Act. Its aim was to restore to the voting rolls the names of 1,377 Negroes stricken in one Louisiana parish at the instance of the White Citizens Council.

District Court Judge J. Skelly Wright directed the names be replaced on the rolls, holding that the state authorities, at the instance of the White Citizens Council, had clearly discriminated against Negroes.

The State appealed to the Federal Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which granted a stay of Judge Wright's order pending review. The Department of Justice then asked immediate review by the Supreme Court in an effort to get the case decided in time to enable the Negroes to vote in the April 19th election. On February 29, the Court ruled unanimously on the basis of the Raines decision, that the stay granted by the Circuit Court should be vacated and that the judgment of the District Court should be affirmed.

In another per curiam opinion, the Court held unanimously that the Civil Rights Act of 1960 removed any doubt that may have arisen under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 as to whether the U.S. Attorney General could bring suit against a State to prevent discrimination in voting. United States v. Alabama, 80 S. Ct. 924, rehear. den., 80 S. Ct. 1608. This suit was brought by the Attorney General against the Board of Registrars of Macon County, Alabama to restrain activities designed to deprive Negores of their voting rights. After the suit was started, the members of the Board resigned and no one was appointed to take their places. The Attorney General then amended his complaint to join the State of Alabama as a defendant.

The District Court dismissed the complaint and its decision was affirmed by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for further proceedings against the State of Alabama. Without considering whether the 1957 Act allowed a suit against a state, it held that a provision in the 1960 Act expressly allowing such suits applied to this proceeding.

A more difficult question was presented to the Court in Hannah v. Larche, 80 S. Ct. 1502. Here, the Court rejected by a 7-2 vote a claim that the Civil Rights Commission, established under the 1957 Civil Rights Act, was required to reveal the names of complainants and to allow persons under investigation to cross-examine other witnesses. Justices Black and Douglas dissented.

The Commission had secured 67 complaints from individual Negroes charging voting discrimination. On the basis of those complaints, it scheduled a hearing and subpoenaed a number of persons.

Two proceedings were then started to enjoin the Commission hearing -- one by a group of election officials and one by a group of private citizens. The District Court granted an injunction and the government took this appeal to the Supreme Court.

The chief arguments made by the plaintiffs were (1) that they should have been given the names of the complainants and (2) that the rules of the Commission improperly denied them the right to confront and cross-examine persons making allegations against them.[1/]

Chief Justice Warren delivered the Court's opinion. The District Court had relied on last year's decision in Greene v. McElroy, 360 U. S. 474 (see AJCongress' Summary of 1958-1959 Term, pp. 12-14), in which the Court invalidated the Industrial Security Program, saying that it would not assume that the government had established a loyalty procedure that allowed the use of secret testimony in the absence of clear authorization. The opinion clearly implied that confrontation was a constitutional requirement in such cases. Here, Chief Justice Warren said that the rule of the Greene case required the Court first to consider whether Congress had clearly authorized the Commission's procedure here. After reviewing the terms of the Act and its legislative history, he concluded that it had.

1/ The plaintiffs also claimed that the Civil Rights Act was not appropriate legislation under the Fifteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court dismissed this claim without detailed discussion.

The Court then went on to hold that the Commission procedures did not deny due process. The Commission's "function is purely investigative and fact-finding. It does not adjudicate." The Court stressed that "the Commission does not and cannot take any affirmative action which will affect an individual's legal rights." The Court found that possible harm to individuals was far outweighed by the fact that allowing cross-examinations by accused persons "would make a shambles of the investigation and stifle the agency in its gathering of facts."

The Court stated that the procedure used by the Civil Rights Commission is traditionally used by investigatory bodies, legislative investigating committees, administrative regulatory commissions (when conducting non-adjudicative investigations), and grand juries. It attached to its opinion a lengthy appendix to substantiate that fact.

Justice Harlan filed a one-paragraph concurrence, in which Justice Clark joined, noting that he agreed with the Chief Justice's opinion but also believed that the case was controlled by In re Groban, 352 U.S. 330 (see AJCongress' Summary of the 1956-1957 Term, p. 23), and Anonymous v. Baker, 360 U.S. 287 (1958-1959 Term, pp. 50-51). Those cases held that witnesses in a fire marshal's investigation of the cause of a fire and in a judicial investigation of "ambulance chasing" did not have the right to counsel.[2/]

2/ Chief Justice Warren, who had dissented in the Groban and Baker cases, referred to them only in a footnote in which he noted that the Commission relied on them but that, since they were substantially different from the present case, the Court did not find it necessary to consider them.

Justice Frankfurter wrote a separate concurring opinion, noting his agreement with much of the majority opinion but offering a somewhat different analysis of the due process issue, especially with respect to the Groban and Baker cases. He made it clear that he also regarded those cases as good authority for the result reached by the Court.

Justice Douglas filed a dissenting opinion in which Justice Black joined. He noted "temptations of many men of goodwill * * * to cut corners, take shortcuts, and reach the desired end regardless of the means." Pointing out that the conduct involved is a federal crime, he said, "There is, in my view, only one way the Chief Executive may move against a person accused of a crime and deny him the right of confrontation and cross-examination and that is by the grand jury." As to the argument that the Commission was doing no more than what other executive agencies did, Justice Douglas denied that these agencies conduct investigative hearings in which the accused persons are compelled to testify.

In response to the Court's view that the Commission's investigation did not affect anyone's legal rights, Justice Douglas argued that "the might and power of the Federal Government have no equal. When its guns are leveled at a citizen on charges that he committed a federal crime, it is for me no answer to say that the only purpose is to report his activities to the President and Congress, not to turn him over to the District Attorney for prosecution."

B. Schools

The various cases affecting public school segregation that came to the Court during the past Term were all decided without opinion. In Faubus v. Aaron, 80 S.Ct. 291, an appeal had been taken from a Federal District Court decision holding that the Arkansas school closing statute violated the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. The statute gave the Governor the right to close the schools (1) when he determined that violence or possible violence endangered lives or property, (2) when Federal troops were stationed in or about the school or (3) when an efficient educational system could not be maintained in an integrated school. The lower court also held that the Constitution invalidated a provision authorizing the withholding of funds from schools closed by the Governor under the preceding provisions.

Without asking for submission of briefs or oral argument, the Supreme Court affirmed the decision below, per curiam. No opinion was written. Justice Whittaker noted that that he would have ordered a hearing in the case.

Review was sought in two cases involving proceedings to end segregation in public schools. In both, the Court followed its practice of the last few years of denying review, thereby leaving to the discretion of the lower courts the speed at which public school authorities are to comply with the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions of 1954 and 1955. One of these cases was County School Board of Prince Edward County v. Allen, 80 S. Ct. 79, which was one of the five cases decided in 1954. Here, the school board had failed to take any steps towards desegregation and the District Court had allowed the Board seven years to put a desegregation plan into effect. The Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed this decision. In asking the Supreme Court to grant certiorari to review that action, the school board claimed that the Circuit Court could not substitute its discretion for that of the District Court. The Supreme Court, however, refused to disturb the Circuit Court's ruling.

The denial of review in Kelley v. Nashville Board of Education, 80 S. Ct. 293, brought a dissent. This was a test of the Nashville stair-stop desegregation program, under which desegregation begins in the first grade with another grade to be added annually. The plan also permits a child to transfer to a different school, out of his normal zone, when the majority of children in the child's grade are of a different race. The Negro parents, represented by the NAACP, asked the Supreme Court to review the decision of the lower courts approving this plan. The Supreme Court denied review, with the Chief Justice and Justices Douglas and Brennan voting in favor of granting review only of the transfer provision on the ground that it "explicitly recognized race as an absolute ground for the transfer of students between schools, thereby perpetuating rather than limiting racial discrimination."[3/]

C. Juries

The question of the exclusion of Negroes from juries was again considered by the Court in United States ex rel. Poret v. Sigler, 80 S. Ct. 404. Without hearing argument, the Court unanimously overturned a lower court ruling denying a writ of habeas corpus and remanded the case to the Federal District Court to determine if "members of petitioner's race were deliberately and intentionally limited and excluded in the selection of petit jury panels, in violation of the Federal Constitution."

3/ The Supreme Court also denied review in (1) Holt v. Raleigh City Board of Education, 80 S. Ct. 59 and Covington v. Edwards, 80 S. Ct. 78, in both of which the lower courts had held that Negro parents had failed to exhaust the administrative remedies provided in the North Carolina pupil placement laws. Justice Douglas dissented in the Covington case. (2) Duckworth v. James, 80 S. Ct. 88, in which the lower court had invalidated an ordinance of Norfolk, Virginia, withholding funds from integrated schools. (3) Brooks v. School District, 80 S. Ct. 196, in which the lower court had rejected a claim of discrimination against Negro teachers in the process of integrating the schools of Moberly, Missouri. (4) Kasper v. Tennessee, 80 S. Ct. 374, in which the Tennessee Supreme Court had denied the claim of John Kasper that his activities in combatting public school integration were protected by the guarantees of free speech in the First Amendment.

In Bailey v. Henslee, 80 S. Ct. 408, the Court denied review of a lower court decision, but without prejudice to a further habeas corpus application in an appropriate federal district court on the same issue.[4/]

D. Trespass

A case that raised a civil rights issue relating to the current "sit-down" problem was disposed of by a divided Court without reaching the constitutional question. In Wolfe v. North Carolina, 80 S. Ct. 1482, the Court refused to disturb the North Carolina conviction of a number of Negroes for trespass, holding by a 5-4 vote that the case presented no federal question.

Wolfe and several other Negroes were charged with violating a state criminal trespass statute by playing on a golf course leased to a private club by the City of Greensboro, N. C. Independently, they sued in a federal court to enjoin Greensboro and the golf club from operating the course on a racially discriminatory basis. They were successful in their federal court action. At their subsequent trial in the state court, the jury was charged that they should be found not guilty if they were excluded from the course on account of race. However, the court did not allow the defendants to introduce the federal court's finding that they were excluded for that reason. The jury convicted, thereby contradicting the federal court finding.

In appealing to the state Supreme Court, the defendants argued that the United States Constitution required the state courts to give conclusive effect

4/ In Harpole v. United States ex rel. Goldsby, 80 S. Ct. 58, the Court denied review of a decision by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals invalidating the conviction of a Negro for murder in Carroll County, Mississippi, on the ground that Negroes had been systematically excluded from juries in that county. The Court of Appeals indicated that it would order Goldsby released unless he was tried before a properly constituted jury within eight months after final action by the Supreme Court.

On the other hand, the Court also refused to hear a claim that a prosecutor had excluded all Negroes from a jury by the use of peremptory challenges. Harris v. Illinois, 80 S. Ct. 755.

to the findings of fact made by the federal district court. However, the defendants, through what their counsel later called "some quirk of inadvertence," failed to include in the record they presented to the state Supreme Court their efforts to introduce the federal court record. The state Supreme Court ruled that, on the record before it, the lower court's ruling was correct and that, under North Carolina law, it could not go outside the record to consider the constitutional question.

The United States Supreme Court, in an opinion by Justice Stewart, dismissed the appeal on the ground that it raised no federal question. The state court's ruling that the defendants failed to preserve their federal question was consistent with the law of the state and was therefore binding on the Supreme Court. The Court stressed that "there is no issue here as to the constitutional right of Negroes to use a public golf course free of racial discrimination."

Chief Justice Warren, dissenting with Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan, argued that the factual premise that the federal court decision was not offered lacked support in the record. Since that was the only state ground for deciding the case, he believed that the Supreme Court should either decide the federal question or remand the case to the state court for further consideration. Furthermore, he argued, even if this offer of evidence was not in the record before the North Carolina Supreme Court, it was before the United States Supreme Court. This provided ample basis for requiring a ruling on the constitutional issue that the defendants had raised.[5/]

5/ The Supreme Court also denied review in two cases involving discrimination in housing: Barnes v. Gadsden, 80 S. Ct. 261, in which the Fifth Circuit Court held the evidence insufficient to show that a city's redevelopment plan provided for racial segregation; and Levitt v. Division Against Discrimination, 80 S. Ct. 1257, in which the New Jersey Supreme Court upheld the state's law against discrimination in publicly assisted housing. Justice Black would have granted review in the latter case.

Finally, in Marshall v. Locomotive Firemen, 80 S. Ct. 407, the Court refused to hear a claim of discrimination against Negro firemen.

II. INTERNAL SECURITY

A. Loyalty Oaths

The Supreme Court refrained from ruling on the validity of a state loyalty oath statute that had been upheld by the Washington State Supreme Court. Nostrand v. Little, 80 S. Ct. 840. By a vote of 7-2, it remanded the case to that court for further consideration.

Several public employees in Washington had sued to have declared unconstitutional a state statute requiring "every employee * * * to state under oath whether or not he or she is a member of the communist party or other subversive organization." The statute further provided that "refusal to answer on any grounds shall be cause for immediate termination of such employee's employment." The Washington Supreme Court upheld the statute but did not pass on the question whether it was constitutionally necessary to provide for a hearing at which refusal to take the oath could be explained or defended.

Since the Washington Supreme Court's decision on the hearing question might alter the constitutional problems in the case and since the state should be allowed to construe its own statute before the United States Supreme Court passes upon it, the Court, in a per curiam opinion, vacated the judgment and remanded the case to the state court.

Justices Black and Douglas dissented, in an opinion by the latter, maintaining that the majority's decision required a useless act. A hearing would be necessary if an employee who took the oath were charged with perjury. "But such a hearing is not germane to the question whether under this statute a teacher has the right to refuse to take the oath that is tendered."

In view of the Court's disposition of the case, neither the Court nor the dissent discussed the validity of the statute.

B. Social Security Benefits

In Flemming v. Nestor, 80 S. Ct. 1367, the Supreme Court divided 5-4 in holding that Congress could deny social security benefits to an alien who was deported for past membership in the Communist Party. The alien, Nestor, came to this country from Bulgaria in 1913. He held employment covered by the Social Security Act from December 1936 to January 1955, during which time deductions were made from his wages. He became eligible for social security retirement benefits in November 1955 and was awarded $55.60 per month. In July 1956, he was deportei for having been a member of the Communist Party from 1933 to 1939. He was thereupon denied payment of further social security payments. (His wife, who remained here, continued to get the benefits due to her.)

Justice Harlan, speaking for the Court, held first that Nestor was not deprived of any accrued property right. Reviewing the terms and history of the Social Security Act, he concluded that Congress had clearly reserved to itself "the right to alter, amend, or repeal any provision" of the Act. A concept of "accrued property rights" would destroy such flexibility.

The Court recognized that Congress could not exercise this power "free of all constitutional restraint." However, it was not unreasonable for Congress to withhold benefits from aliens deported for various reasons, including not only subversive activities but also various crimes and practices such as narcotics addiction.

Nestor claimed that the law was unconstitutional because it punished him without judicial trial, because it was a bill of attainder (punishment by a legislative act), and because it was ex post facto. The Court rejected those claims on the ground that the denial of benefits was not "punishment." "Here the sanction is the mere denial of a non-contractual governmental benefit. No affirmative disability or restraint is imposed, and certainly nothing approaching the 'infamous punishment' of imprisonment."

It was argued that "a punitive purpose in fact lay behind the statute. * * * We observe initially that only the clearest proof could suffice to establish the unconstitutionality of a statute on such a ground." It appears that Congress' primary interest was with the fact of deportation and not with the grounds therefor. Evidence of Congressional intent to punish for past Communist Party membership is lacking.

Three dissents were filed, one by Justice Brennan, in which the Chief Justice and Justices Black and Douglas joined, one by Justice Douglas, in which Justice Black joined, and one by Justice Black.

Justice Black would have held the law unconstitutional as a deprivation of property without due process, as a bill of attainder and as an ex post facto law. " The fact that the Court is sustaining this action indicates the extent to which people are willing to go these days to overlook violations of the Constitution perpetrated against anyone who has ever even innocently belongod to the Communist Party." He denied that there was no connection under the Social Security Act between payments and benefits, saying that the Act was based on the assumption "that it is not desirable that aged people think of the Government as giving them something for nothing." On the matter of bill of attainder and ex post facto, he insisted that the denial of benefits was a punishment, directed at an ascertainable group.

Justice Douglas argued that the law was a bill of attainder. Tracing the history of the provision, he concluded that it was clearly "vindictive."

Justice Brennan argued that there was nothing to support the majority's conclusion that the law had a reasonable purpose. "The common sense of it is that he has been punished severely for his past conduct." Without reaching the question of bill of attainder, he would have held the law unconstitutional because it "imposes punishment in violation of the prohibition against ex post facto laws and without a judicial trial."

C. Self-Incrimination

In Nelson v. County of Los Angeles, 80 S. Ct. 527, the Supreme Court approved the dismissal of two employees by Los Angeles County for refusing to answer questions at a hearing of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. One discharge, that of a permanent civil service employee, was approved by an equally divided court and was therefore not discussed in the opinion. The other petitioner, Globe, was a temporary employee. His discharge was approved, 5-3. Chief Justice Warren did not participate.

Globe had been subpoenaed to testify before the House Committee. The Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors, acting under Section 1028.1 of the Government Code of California, ordered Globe to give testimony to the Committee. He refused to answer a number of questions, including whether he was a member of the Communist Party, relying on both the First and Fifth Amendments. He was thereupon discharged for "insubordination," since he had violated the instruction to answer all questions.

Justice Clark delivered the Court's opinion. The principal question was whether the case was controlled by the Supreme Court's 5-4 decision of 1956 in Slochower v. Board of Higher Education, 350 U.S. 551. The Supreme Court there held that the discharge of an employee merely for taking the Fifth Amendment was arbitrary. Justice Clark distinguished Slochower on the ground that the discharge here was not for taking the Fifth Amendment but for "insubordination," that is, refusing to answer a question. "California has not predicated discharge on any 'built-in' inference of guilt in its statute, but solely on employee insubordination for failure to give information which we have held that the State has a legitimate interest in securing."

Here, the Court held, the case is controlled by several recent decisions holding that the state can require employees to give information affecting security. Even though the statute may deter exercise of the federal privilege, the state may "legitimately predicate discharge on refusal to give information touching on the field of security."

Justice Black wrote a dissenting opinion, as did Justice Brennan, both of which were concurred in by Justice Douglas. Justice Black noted that the insubordination to the state consisted solely of the invocation of constitutional rights. "I would hold that no State can put any kind of penalty on any person for claiming a privilege authorized by the Federal Constitution."

Justice Brennan viewed the case as indistinguishable from Slochower. If a state cannot discharge an employee for exercising constitutional privileges, it cannot do so by issuing a general command to its employees not to invoke constitutional privileges, and then discharging them for insubordination to its order when they do.

D. Searches and Seizures

The conviction of Rudolph Ivanovich Abel for conspiracy to commit espionage was affirmed by a sharply divided Court in Abel v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 683, rehear. den., 80 S. Ct. 1056. The five-member majority, in an opinion by Justice Frankfurter, held that the administrative warrant under which

Abel was arrested was sufficient to authorize his arrest and that therefore evidence obtained by a search of Abel's hotel room was obtained in a constitutional manner and was properly admissible at Abel's trial.

The FBI had information linking Abel with espionage but not enough to justify his arrest and indictment. FBI agents notified the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) that Abel appeared to be an alien residing illegally in the United States. The INS was also told of the FBI's espionage suspicions. INS agents thereupon obtained an administrative warrant from the New York District Director of the INS for Abel's arrest pending deportation. They proceeded to his hotel room in New York City, together with several FBI agents. The FBI agents were first allowed to try to get Abel to "cooperate" in the espionage matter. When they failed, the INS agents were called in to arrest Abel and search both Abel and the apartment, supposedly for evidence relating to his deportability. The material Abel took with him after the arrest was searched on his arrival at INS headquarters. His room was searched by FBI agents after his arrest and departure from the hotel. Later in the day, Abel was taken by airplane to an alien detention center in Texas, where he remained for several weeks until arrested on the conspiracy charge for which he was tried.

Abel appealed to the Supreme Court from his conviction for espionage, contending that use of the evidence obtained at the time of his arrest for deportation violated the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution in a number of respects.

Earlier Supreme Court decisions establish that, when a criminal arrest is made properly, a search may be made without warrant for certain limited purposes. In the present case, the Supreme Court held that the same rules apply in the case of an administrative arrest. Justice Frankfurter argued that protection against unlawful searches must be, if anything, stricter in the case of arrests for crimes than in the case of non-criminal proceedings like deportation. It was at these searches in criminal cases that the Fourth Amendment was primarily directed.

The Court went on to hold that each of the items was properly seized. Thus, a coded message was properly taken when the arresting officer saw Abel try to slide it into his sleeve, because an officer can prevent destruction of evidence. A forged birth certificate had possible bearing on efforts to avoid detection as a deportable alien. As to the two items that were found by the FBI in Abel's hotel room after he had checked out, Abel had abandoned these items and the hotel management had given its consent to the search and seizure. Since all of the items were properly seized, they could be introduced in evidence at Abel's trial.

Noting that the defendant claimed that the administrative arrest was used by the Government in bad faith to get around the Constitution, Justice Frankfurter said, "the deliberate use by the Government of an administrative warrant for the purpose of gathering evidence in a criminal case must meet stern resistance by the courts." He held, however, that the record as a whole precluded a conclusion of bad faith.

Abel had also argued that there was no authority for an administrative arrest in the first place. The majority ruled that this claim was not properly before the Court because Abel had conceded in the lower courts that the arrest was valid. Justice Frankfurter went on to say, however, that the Fourth Amendment guarantee did not apply to administrative arrests.

Justice Douglas dissented in an opinion joined by Justice Black. Even if an administrative warrant is permitted for an arrest for the purpose of deportation, he urged that it should not be made the basis for a search in a criminal case without judicial warrant.

A further dissent was written by Justice Brennan, in which the Chief Justice and Justices Black and Douglas joined. Justice Brennan stressed the constitutional requirement of judicial review of searches by law enforcement officials. The procedure approved by the Court, he concluded, eliminated that constitutional safeguard. He regarded the issue of good faith as irrolevant pointing to the possibility of abuse when the fruits of administrative arrests can be used in criminal proceedings. He warned that "Where a species of arrest is available that is subject to no judicial control, the possibilities [of abuse] become more and more serious."

E. Deportation

The case of Kimm v. Rosenberg, 80 S. Ct. 1139, involved an alien who entered this country as a student in 1928 and pursued his studies until 1938. He planned to return to Korea but changed his mind after the outbreak of hostilities between China and Japan in 1937. After 1938, he was continuously employed in gainful occupations - manager of a produce company, chemist, foundry worker, member of the O.S.S. during World War II, and publisher of a paper, "Korean Independence."

Because Kimm entered as a student and no longer enjoyed that status, he was concededly deportable. On being ordered deported, he applied for suspension of the order by the Attorney General. Under the statute, the Attorney General has power to suspend deportation in the case of any alien who has good moral character for the preceding five years and has resided continuously in the United States for seven years. However, he cannot exercise that power in the case of an alien who is deportable because he is a member of the Communist Party.

At his hearing, Kimm was asked whether he was a member of the Communist Party. He refused to answer on the ground of self-incrimination. Thereupon, the hearing officer ruled that the Attorney General had no power to exercise his discretion to suspend Kimm's deportation order. By a 5-4 vote, the Supreme Court upheld this ruling. It concluded that Kimm had the burden of proving he was not a Communist.

In a brief per curiam opinion, the Court noted that the class of members of the Communist Party and certain other groups is carved out of the subsection granting the Attorney General power to suspend deportation orders. The provision in the regulations imposing on the applicant the burden of proof in the case of such "statutory requirements precedent to the exercise of discretionary relief" does not conflict with the immigration laws. Consequently, the Court held, the Attorney General did not have power to suspend Kimm's deportation.

Justice Brennan's dissent, joined in by Chief Justice Warren and Justice Douglas, noted the anomaly that the government must prove membership in the Communist Party if it attempts to deport on account of such membership but that the deportee has the burden of proving the absence of such membership if he is being deported on another ground. In the latter case, the alien is deported even though there is no evidence that he is a member.

Justice Douglas, joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justice Black, filed an additional dissent, stressing that this was the latest in a series of cases involving punishment for invoking a constitutional right.

In another per curiam opinion, from which the same four members of the Court dissented, the Supreme Court held that a District Court's finding that an alien was deportable because he was a member of the Communist Party within the meaning of the Internal Security Act of 1950 was not clearly erroneous. Niukkanen v. McAlexander, 80 S. Ct. 799.

This was a habeas corpus proceeding in which Niukkanen, an alien, sought relief from a deportation order based on his past membership in the Communist Party. The principal question was whether the case came within the scope of Galvan v. Press, 347 U.S. 522 (1954), or Rowoldt v. Perfetto, 355 U.S. 115 (1957). (See AJCongress' Summary of the 1957-1958 Term, pp. 25-26.) In the Galvan case, an alien was held deportable as a member of the Communist Party even though he joined without knowledge of its advocacy of violence. The Court ruled that it was sufficient that he joined of his own free will and was aware of it as a distinct and active political organization. In Rowoldt, the Court decided that, although Rowoldt had been a member of the Communist Party, he was predominantly motivated in joining by concern with unemployment and bread and not by politics. Hence, the Court concluded, his association was not the "meaningful association" required under the Act.

In its brief per curiam opinion, the Court declared that the decision whether this case fell within Galvan or Rowoldt depended on evaluation of the testimony and that the Court could not say that the District Court's decision against Niukkanen was clearly erroneous. It noted that the lower court had taken into consideration the fact that Niukkanen, unlike Rowoldt, had denied membership in the Party and that this denial was apparently perjurious.

Justice Douglas filed a dissenting opinion, in which the Chief Justice and Justices Black and Brennan joined. He noted that Niukkanen came to this country in 1909 at the age of one, that he had lived here since then, that he had served honorably in the Army, that he was married to a citizen and that he had no criminal record except for a petty offense in 1930. There was testimony that Niukkanen's Communist Party membership from 1937 to 1939 was due only to his interest in problems of unemployment and relief. (This was the testimony of his accusers, as he himself had denied membership.) Accordingly, Justice Douglas asserted, Rowoldt v. Perfetto was determinative of this case.

Twenty days after the Court denied the writ of habeas corpus, Niukkanen died.

III. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

A. Freedom of Association

In Bates v. Little Rock, 80 S. Ct. 412, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed the conviction of a group of officers of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), for refusing to submit the membership lists of their local chapters to the cities of Little Rock and North Little Rock, Ark. Both cities, in 1957, had amended their existing laws that impose annual license taxes on various businesses, occupations and professions. The 1957 amendments required that each organization functioning within the cities must, upon request, supply certain information including the organizational name, purpose and officers and lists of all its contributors and dues payers. All information thereby obtained was, by the terms of the ordinance, to be open to public inspection.

The local officers of NAACP who had custody of the records of the NAACP branches in Little Rock and North Little Rock supplied all of the required information except the names of members and contributors. For their refusal to submit this information, they were charged with violating the ordinance. At the trial, the defendants presented evidence that the membership of NAACP had declined as a result of the ordinances and that those identified as members of the NAACP had been harassed. Nevertheless, they were convicted and fined.

In an opinion by Justice Stewart, the Court declared that the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association gives protection against subtle as well as direct governmental interference. The evidence here shows that compulsory disclosure of membership lists significantly interferes with that freedom.

Accordingly, the Court must determine "whether the cities * * * demonstrated so cogent an interest in obtaining and making public the membership lists of these organizations as to justify the substantial abridgement of associational freedom which such disclosures will effect." Justice Stewart concluded that no such interest was shown. A city has an undoubted right to impose occupational license taxes but the action it takes must have a reasonable relationship to the achievement of that proper end. Nothing here indicated that the NAACP membership lists had any relevance to proceedings under the tax law.

Justices Black and Douglas, concurring, noted that they agreed "substantially" with the Court's opinion but stressed that "... First Amendment rights are beyond abridgement either by legislation that directly restrains their exercise or by suppression or impairment through harassment, humiliation, or exposure by government."

B. Anonymous Literature

A Los Angeles ordinance prohibiting the distribution of unsigned handbills was struck down by the Supreme Court by a 6-3 vote in Talley v. California, 80 S. Ct. 536. The ordinance made it a crime to distribute handbills unless they carried the names of the author and distributor. Talley was arrested and convicted under this ordinance for passing out handbills urging persons not to patronize a store because it carried the products of certain companies that discriminated against Negroes in employment. The handbills were signed "National Consumers Mobilization, Box 6533, Los Angeles 55, Calif. PLeasant 9-1576."

Justice Black delivered the Court's opinion. He found that the requirement of identification here "would tend to restrict * * * freedom of expression." Anonymous literature has made important contributions to freedom in the past. "It is plain that anonymity has sometimes been assumed for the most constructive purposes."

The Court cited the two recent cases in which it struck down efforts by Southern states to obtain the names of members of the NAACP, Bates v. Little Rock, 80 S. Ct. 412 (1960) (summarized above, pp. 24-25), and NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (1958) (see AJCongress' Summary of the 1957-1958 Term, pp. 29-31), saying that "there are times and circumstances when States may not compel members of groups engaged in the dissemination of ideas to be publicly identified."

The State had argued that the ordinance was designed to identify those "responsible for fraud, false advertising and libel." The Court found, however, that it was not so limited nor was there any evidence that that was its purpose. Hence, it said, "we do not pass on the validity of an ordinance limited to prevent these or any other supposed evils."

Justice Harlan agreed that the ordinance violated the Fourteenth Amendment. However, he based his conclusion on a balancing of countervailing interests, finding that the asserted need for the ordinance was not substantial enough to cover a ban on all anonymous handbills.

Justice Clark was joined in his expression of dissent by Justices Frankfurter and Whittaker. He argued that the substantial state interest which provoked this legislation eclipsed the individual harm to Talley and that free speech does not include free anonymous speech. He pointed to other areas in which disclosure is required, such as the names of the editor, publisher and owners of newspapers. Distinguishing the cases involving NAACP membership, he said that no showing was made here, as it was in those cases, that Talley might be subjected to reprisals.

C. Obscenity

Smith v. California, 80 S. Ct. 215, rehear. den., 80 S. Ct. 399, is the latest of the Supreme Court's efforts to deal with constitutional limitations on prosecutions for activities relating to obscene books. The defendant was convicted of violating a Los Angeles ordinance which made it unlawful "for any person to have in his possession any obscene or indecent writing, [or] book * * * in any place of business where * * * books * * * are sold or kept for sale." This ordinance was construed by the California courts as imposing an absolute criminal liability, not dependent upon any "guilty knowledge" or knowledge on the part of the defendant of the content of the books which he kept for sale. The Supreme Court reversed the conviction, with Justice Harlan dissenting in part.

Justice Brennan delivered an opinion for the Court in which the Chief Justice and Justices Clark, Whittaker and Stewart concurred. Justice Brennan noted that the practical consequence of a rule of absolute liability would be a self-imposed censorship on the part of the booksellers, who would limit their sales activities to those books which they investigated and concluded to be clearly not obscene. The resulting restriction on dissemination of non-obscene material would be the result of governmental action even though not directly required by the government. The Court emphasized that the requirement that criminal statutes be definite and clear is applied with special strictness where there is a potential restriction on freedom of speech.

However, in requiring some element of a guilty intent, the majority specifically refused to lay down guide lines for courts and legislatures as to what sort of intent is required by the Constitution. It limited itself to holding that a statute or ordinance may not constitutionally eliminate all aspects of the mental attitude of the defendant from the elements of the crime of selling or distributing allegedly obscene material.

Justices Black and Douglas, in separate concurring opinions, urged, as they had in the past, that the First Amendment bars all interference with the press. Justice Black concurred in the judgment but felt that the Court's opinion opened the way to more censorship. "Their [the booksellers'] victory, if any, is a Pyrrhic one." Justice Douglas objected to the Court's role of censor, "but since by the prevailing school of thought we must perform it, I see no harm, and perhaps some good, in the rule fashioned by the Court which requires a showing of scienter."

Justice Frankfurter, also concurring in the result, protested against the Court's refusal to clarify the requirement of intent. He held that, in any case, the defendant must have the right to enlighten the judge and jury "regarding the prevailing literary and moral community standards and to do so through qualified experts."

Justice Harlan concurred in the Court's decision to reverse the conviction but would have remanded the case for a new trial. He urged that the Court should recognize that the states have a proper concern with obscenity and that this justifies a wider scope to state power than to federal power in this field. He agreed with Justice Frankfurter that it is necessary to allow the defendant to present testimony as to contemporary community standards in determining the obscene nature of the material involved but he disagreed with the latter's conclusion that the Court must admit expert testimony. He would have reversed the conviction in this case on the ground that "the trial judge, as I read the record, turned aside every attempt by appellant to introduce evidence bearing on community standards."

D. Religious Freedom

In Kreshik v. St. Nicholas Cathedral, 80 S. Ct. 1037, the Supreme Court considered again the extended litigation concerning the assets in New York of the Russian Orthodox Church.

Under canon law, the Archbishop of the North American Archdiocese of the Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Church is the appointee of the Patriarch of Moscow. As such, he is entitled to the use and occupancy of St. Nicholas Cathedral in New York City. In 1945, the New York Legislature amended the Religious Corporations Law to transfer control of the Cathedral to a representative chosen by the local communicants. This action was sought to be justified on the ground that the Moscow Patriarch was no longer capable of functioning as a true religious authority but had become a tool of the Soviet government, primarily designed to implement its foreign policy. The legislation was sustained by the New York State Court of Appeals, but was struck down in Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral, 344 U.S. 94 (1952), as an interference with the "free exercise of religion" in violation of the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The Court of Appeals then ordered a retrial upon the issue, assertedly left open in Kedroff, whether, under New York common law, the Archbishop could validly exercise the right to occupy the Cathedral. The New York trial court rejected the contention that the Archbishop was no more than a political representative of the Soviet government and had no common law right to occupy the Cathedral. The intermediate appellate court unanimously affirmed. However, the New York Court of Appeals, in a 4-3 decision, reversed the lower courts, holding that the Archbishop was disqualified under the common law on the same grounds that that court had sought to uphold the legislation in Kedroff.

This holding the Supreme Court unanimously reversed in Kreshik without even hearing oral argument. The brief per curiam opinion noted that "it is established doctrine" that constitutional guarantees are no less binding on the judicial branch of the state than upon the legislative, citing NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (see AJCongress' Summary of the 1957-1958 Term, pp. 29-31) and Shelly v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, the restrictive covenant case. Since the Court of Appeals' decision in Kreshik "rests on the same premises which were found to have underlain the enactment of the statute struck down in Kedroff," said the Court, this judgment, too, must be reversed and the complaint dismissed.

IV. IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY

Aside from the two deportation cases described above in the section on internal security, the only decision during the Term in the area of nationality was Mackey v. Mendoza-Martinez, 80 S. Ct. 785. That case involved an issue left open in the Supreme Court expatriation decisions of 1958. For procedural reasons, the Court again failed to dispose of the issue.

Mendoza brought this declaratory judgmont action to establish his citizenship, which was questioned because he left the United States in 1942 in order to avoid the draft and remained away until 1946. He was subsequently convicted of draft evasion.

In Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (see AJCongress' Summary of the 1957-1958 Term, pp. 37-38), one of the 1958 decisions, a five-member majority struck down Section 401(g) of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended, which provided that even a native-born citizen would lose his American citizenship if he deserted during war time, whether or not he attempted to give allegiance to a foreign power. Mendoza's citizenship was questioned under paragraph (j) of this same section, which deprives a person of citizenship if he departs from the United States during

This holding the Supreme Court unanimously reversed in Kreshik without even hearing oral argument. The brief per curiam opinion noted that "it is established doctrine" that constitutional guarantees are no less binding on the judicial branch of the state than upon the legislative, citing NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449 (see AJCongress' Summary of the 1957-1958 Term, pp. 29-31) and Shelly v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, the restrictive covenant case. Since the Court of Appeals' decision in Kreshik "rests on the same premises which were found to have underlain the enactment of the statute struck down in Kedroff," said the Court, this judgment, too, must be reversed and the complaint dismissed.

IV. IMMIGRATION AND NATIONALITY

Aside from the two deportation cases described above in the section on internal security, the only decision during the Term in the area of nationality was Mackey v. Mendoza-Martinez, 80 S. Ct. 785. That case involved an issue left open in the Supreme Court expatriation decisions of 1958. For procedural reasons, the Court again failed to dispose of the issue.

Mendoza brought this declaratory judgment action to establish his citizenship, which was questioned because he left the United States in 1942 in order to avoid the draft and remained away until 1946. He was subsequently convicted of draft evasion.

In Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (see AJCongress' Summary of the 1957-1958 Term, pp. 37-38), one of the 1958 decisions, a five-member majority struck down Section 401(g) of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended, which provided that even a native-born citizen would lose his American citizenship if he deserted during war time, whether or not he attempted to give allegiance to a foreign power. Mendoza's citizenship was questioned under paragraph (j) of this same section, which deprives a person of citizenship if he departs from the United States during war time to avoid military service. Mendoza was before the Supreme Court in 1958. At that time, the Court remanded the case to the District Court for rehearing in light of Trop.

The District Court then held section 401(j) unconstitutional. On the government's appeal, the Supreme Court itself raised a new question - whether Mendoza's conviction in 1947 for draft evasion implied that he was then a citizen. Mendoza argued that, on the facts of his case, citizenship was a necessary requisite to guilt of draft evasion; that the government, in prosecuting him for that crime must be taken to have conceded his citizenship; and that the government was thereby collaterally estopped from now contesting it.

Since the collateral estoppel issue might dispose of the case without the necessity of ruling on the constitutionality of 401(j), the Court, in a per curiam opinion, remanded the case again to the District Court with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings and introduce evidence on this matter.

Justice Frankfurter, in a separate memorandum, noted that "the intrinsic demands of orderliness in the judicial process require that the issue on which this Court is to render judgment should be appropriately defined through pleadings and proceedings in the lower courts and not be initially shaped for adjudication in this Court." Accordingly, he would simply have dismissed all pending proceedings, to allow a fresh start.

Justices Harlan and Whittaker joined in Justice Clark's dissenting opinion, which pointed out that this case had been in the courts six years and that the Supreme Court should be able to pass on the collateral estoppel question, which it itself raised, without additional delay. "The Court could then pass upon the constitutional issue and advise the Congress of its power in this important field, in which it legislated 16 years ago."

V. OTHER CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

A. Searches and Seizures.

In addition to the Abel case described above in the section on internal security, the Court decided five cases dealing with the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment.

In Jones v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 725, the defendant was arrested in an apartment by federal narcotics officers pursuant to a search warrant. Narcotics and narcotics equipment were found in the apartment. He was later convicted under two counts upon proof that he was in "possession" of narcotics. He claimed that the search warrant was defective and that it was improperly executed. The government challenged his right to raise these questions because Jones claimed the apartment did not belong to him.

The Supreme Court held unanimously that Jones had standing to challenge the search. Justice Frankfurter, speaking for the Court, pointed out that acceptance of the government's position would allow it to convict the defendant on the basis of conflicting positions. The conviction flowed from possession of narcotics at the time of the search. Yet the government's opposition to his challenge of the search was based on the argument that he did not have possession of the narcotics because they were found in someone else's apartment. "The prosecution here thus subjected the defendant to the penalties meted out to one in lawless possession while refusing him the remedies designed for one in that situation."

Having thus accepted the defendant's standing to challenge the search, the Court went on to reject, with Justice Douglas dissenting, his argument that there was no probable cause for issuing the search warrant because it was based on information from an undisclosed source. Although the affidavit presented by the detective on requesting the warrant was based on hearsay, it stated convincing grounds for crediting the hearsay. Justice Frankfurter noted that there was sufficient evidence to justify the officer's acting without a warrant in an emergency. He regarded it as unwise to require a greater degree of certainty when an officer acts with a warrant than without a warrant. Otherwise, police would be induced to effect searches and arrests without warrants.

Jones also claimed that the warrant was not executed in accordance with the applicable statute. Without going into details, the Court found that there was conflicting testimony on this point and that the case should therefore be remanded to the District Court for disposition of this question.

Justice Douglas, dissenting in part, argued that the Court's ruling was further proof that "this is an age where faceless informers have been reintroduced into our society." The magistrate's decision to issue a warrant should be based on facts brought before him, not on the policeman's characterization of the facts available to the police.

In two cases decided the same day, the Supreme Court overturned the "silver platter" doctrine under which evidence illegally obtained by state officials without the cooperation of federal officials could be introduced in federal trials, even though evidence illegally obtained by federal officials could not be. Rios v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 1431; Elkins v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 1437. The original doctrine was established in Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914).

In these two cases, the defendants had been prosecuted in state courts, which held that evidence on which the prosecution relied had been unlawfully obtained by state officers. Accordingly the indictment was dismissed in Elkins and in Rios the defendant was acquitted. The evidence in question was then turned over (on a "silver platter") to federal authorities who were not involved in the original unlawful seizures. The defendants were prosecuted under federal laws and the evidence was used against them. They appealed their convictions to the Supreme Court.

In each case, Justice Stewart wrote the opinion for a five-man majority reversing the convictions. He declared that the 1914 decision in Weeks rested on the theory that federal courts should not use evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment prohibition of unlawful searches and seizures. The holding in that case that this rule did not apply to evidence obtained by state officials rested on the Court's assumption that the Fourth Amendment applied only to the federal government. However, in 1949, in Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, "it was unequivocally determined by a unanimous Court that the Federal Constitution, by virtue of the Fourteenth Amendment, prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures by state officers." Thus, the logical basis for the "silver platter" doctrine was destroyed.

At the time Weeks was decided, only one state excluded from its courts illegally-obtained evidence. Since that time, the number has grown until now over half the states exclude such evidence. The trend toward exclusion is clear.

It does not appear that exclusion of such evidence substantially inhibits law enforcement agencies. The work of the F.B.I. in particular, operating under an exclusionary rule since Weeks, does not appear to have suffered on account of that rule.

The Court then went on to hold that the admission of the evidence in a federal court must depend on federal rather than state law. The trial court must make an independent inquiry as to whether the state officials' acts, if committed by federal officials, would have been barred by the Fourth Amendment. Since the trial courts in these two cases admitted the evidence without considering this question, the convictions were reversed and the cases were remanded for further proceedings.

Justice Frankfurter, dissenting, disagreed that the Wolf decision made the Fourth Amendment applicable to the states. The Court's present ruling requires it to differentiate in the future between the two types of illegality - violation of laws and violation of constitutional guarantees. Until now, the Court's view of the Fourth Amendment has been "fluctuating and uncertain." This uncertainty will now be imported into every federal case in which it is sought to exclude state-obtained evidence.

However, Justice Frankfurter would have modified the Weeks rule to some extent. He urged that the state rule on exclusion should govern evidence secured by officials of that state and sought to be introduced into the federal courts. This would give recognition to the efforts by the individual states to control the actions of their police officials. If that modification is not adopted, then Justice Frankfurter would adhere to the rule enunciated in Weeks.

Justices Harlan, Clark and Whittaker, in a Memorandum Opinion by Justice Harlan, joined Justice Frankfurter except that they were not willing to accept the modification of the Weeks rule that he suggested.[6/]

In Henry v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 168 (1959), the issue turned on whether FBI agents had "probable cause" to make an arrest leading to the discovery of radios taken across state lines.

FBI agents were investigating a theft from an interstate whiskey shipment. They were given a tip that one Pierotti was implicated in "interstate shipments." The agents twice saw the defendant, Henry, and Pierotti drive to a residence and return to the car with some cartons. The agents were unable to identify the cartons. As the car drove off the second time, the agents followed it and later stopped it. As they approached the car, they overheard Henry telling Pierotti that he should say that they had just met. The agents searched the car, found that the cartons contained radios, and brought the two men to their office. When, two hours later, they found that the radios had been stolen, Henry and Pierotti were placed under formal arrest.

6/ In two other cases decided on the same day, Euziere v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 1615, and Camara v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 1619, the Court vacated the judgments below and remanded for reconsideration in the light of its decisions in Elkins and Rios. Justice Frankfurter dissented in Euziere and would have reversed in Camara for the reasons enunciated in his dissent in Elkins and Rios.

The Court, in an opinion by Justice Douglas, held, 7-2, that there was no probable cause for the arrest. Since the arrest was illegal, the evidence obtained in the following search was inadmissible.

Arrests for federal felonies may be made without a warrant only if the offense has been committed in the presence of the arresting officer, or where there are reasonable grounds to believe that a felony has been committed. This requirement, the Court said, is mandatory under the "searches and seizures" provision of the Fourth Amendment.

The prosecution had conceded here that the arrest took place when the agents stopped the car. The Court held that there was no probable cause at that point to suspect that a felony had been committed. Riding to an alley and picking up packages, actions in themselves completely harmless, would not reasonably suggest participation in a felony. The results of the subsequent search are irrelevant to the question whether there was probable cause to have stopped the car.

Justice Black concurred in the result.

Justice Clark filed a dissent in which Chief Justice Warren joined. The dissent rejected the Government's concession and concluded that the mere stopping of the car did not constitute an arrest. Thus, the information against Pierotti, the loading of the cartons, the following of the men, the patently false statement of the defendant (false since the agents knew that they had been together), when combined with the sighting of the cartons prior to the arrest, provided probable cause for the subsequent arrest.

An unusual situation arose in the Court conerning an Ohio case, Ohio ex rel. Eaton v. Price, 80 S. Ct. 1463, which raised an issue similar to the Court's decision last year in Frank v. Maryland, 359 U.S. 360. The Court there held, 5-4, that the City of Baltimore could authorize its Health Commissioner to search a house without a warrant when he had reason to believe that a nuisance existed in the house. (See AJCongress' Summary of the 1958-1959 Term, pp. 39-41.) At the time that case was pending, the petitioner in this case asked the Court to review a Dayton ordinance authorizing the Housing Inspector "to enter, examine and survey at any reasonable hour all dwellings" for the purpose of safeguarding health and safety. The petitioner stated that his case raised substantially the same questions as the Frank case.

The Supreme Court waited until it had disposed of the Frank case and then considered the appeal in the present case. Under Supreme Court practice, if four Justices vote to entertain an appeal, the Court "notes probable jurisdiction" and sets the case down for full consideration. Here, the four Justices who dissented in the Frank case voted to consider the appeal and it was so ordered. However, four of the five Justices who had made up the majority in the Frank case took the unusual course of protesting this ruling, urging that it was, in effect, an effort to obtain reconsideration and reversal of the Frank decision (360 U.S. 246). (The fifth member of the majority, Justice Stewart, disqualified himself in this case.) Justice Brennan, at that time expressed disapproval of the statement by the four Justices, pointing out that it constituted a prejudgment of a case that had been set down for full consideration.

At the present term of the Court, the decision of the Ohio Court was affirmed by a 4-4 vote. Ordinarily, when this happens, the Court writes no opinions because such an affirmance by an equally divided Court does not establish any precedent. This time, however, Justice Brennan wrote an opinion, in which the Chief Justice and Justices Black and Douglas concurred, setting forth why he believed the judgment below should be reversed. He stated that he did so because the four Justices voting to affirm had expressed their view the previous year.

The present case involved an effort to search the home of one Earl Taylor. When inspectors came to search his house, they did not have a warrant, nor did they give any reason for searching the house except to say that they were inspectors. When Taylor insisted on either a warrant or a reason, the inspectors proceeded to invoke the ordinance's penal clause. Taylor was held for trial on charges which could have resulted in a fine of $200 and imprisonment of 30 days for each day's recalcitrance. The case came before the United States Supreme Court on a writ of habeas corpus to test the constitutionality of Taylor's incarceration.

Justice Brennan distinguished the Frank case on the ground that the Health Inspector there had demonstrated substantial reason to suspect that Frank's house was a nesting place for rats. Here, the inspector refused to give any justification for his demand. He went on to say, however, that he viewed the Frank decision as undermining the Fourth Amendment. "For that reason, even if it were on all fours with the present case, it should not be followed, and the judgment below should be reversed."

B. Double Jeopardy

In a unanimous decision, the Supreme Court laid to rest doubts regarding one corner of the double jeopardy field. A federal Court of Appeals reversed a conviction for conspiring to attempt to evade income taxes and directed the entry of an acquittal judgment. On rehearing, the Court of Appeals modified its original order so as to direct a new trial. The Supreme Court held, per Justice Clark, that this new trial, ordered on rehearing after an order directing acquittal, did not constitute double jeopardy. Forman v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 481, rehear. den., 80 S. Ct. 749.

Forman and another were indicted in 1953 for conspiring to attempt to evade taxes on their 1942-1945 incomes. At the time of the indictment the statute of limitations had run on the original evasion. However, the indictment charged that certain overt acts took place in later years, up to 1952, in furtherance of the conspiracy. At Forman's request, the trial court charged that he should be acquitted (because the statute of limitations had run) unless the jury found a subsidiary conspiracy to conceal the crime relating to the 1942-1945 income.

After the trial, but before the first decision by the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court decided Grunewald v. United States, 353 U.S. 391 (1957), in which it held that the statute of limitations could not be extended by this sort of subsidiary conspiracy theory. The Court of Appeals first noted the improper charge to the jury and directed a judgment of acquittal. On rehearing, before the judgment was entered, it was concluded that the original indictment, which had alleged a continuing conspiracy, was sufficient even under the Grunewald holding. Since the improper subsidiary conspiracy charge was requested by Forman, not by the government, it was appropriate to order a new trial.

The Supreme Court affirmed the Court of Appeals decision to remand for a new trial and upheld that court's right to enter such an order on rehearing after having ordered the trial court to enter a judgment of acquittal. It rejected Forman's contention that the earlier order gave him a vested right in an acquittal.

No such right accrues until the entry of a judgment of acquittal or at least the issuance of a Court of Appeals mandate requiring entry of such a judgment.

Justices Harlan and Whittaker concurred, in separate opinions, both stressing the correctness of the Court of Appeals' final ruling and not referring to the main double jeopardy issue before the Supreme Court.

In Petite v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 450, after the Supreme Court agreed to hear the case, the Solicitor General joined the defendant's attorney in asking the Court to direct the Federal District Court to dismiss the indictment. The defendant had been indicted for conspiring to make false statements to a government agency at hearings in Philadelphia and Baltimore. He was also separately indicted for subornation of perjury at the Philadelphia hearings. After the defendant decided not to contest the conspiracy charge, the government dismissed the subornation indictment. After serving his two-month sentence for conspiracy, the defendant was indicted for subornation of perjury at the Baltimore hearings. The perjury involved in this charge was part of the case against the defendant in the conspiracy charge. However, the trial court and the Court of Appeals rejected the defendant's claim that this put him in double jeopardy. The Supreme Court granted defendant's petition for a writ of certiorari.

The Solicitor General's request for remand with instructions to dismiss the indictment was based on the government's policy "that several offenses arising out of a single transaction should be alleged and tried together and should not be made the basis of multiple prosecutions, a policy dictated by considerations of fairness to defendants and of efficient and orderly law enforcement." Reference was also made to the Attorney General's policy statement regarding duplicating federal-state prosecutions, which was issued on April 6, 1959, after the Supreme Court's decisions in Abbate v. United States, 359 U S. 187 (1959), and

Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U. S. 121 (1959). (See AJCongress' Summary of the 1958-1959 Term, pp. 42-44.)

In a per curiam opinion, the Court directed dismissal of the indictment. It noted its reluctance to decide issues of constitutional law before it is necessary to do so. The Court stressed that its decision in no sense implied any opinion on the substantive issue of the case.

Chief Justice Warren concurred, pointing out that the Court should agree to such motions by the Solicitor General unless it felt that they were efforts to avoid decisions unfavorable to the government and that this was not such an effort.

Justice Brennan, joined by Justices Black and Douglas, objected to leaving this important area of the law to stipulation of the parties and to a government "policy whose only written expression does not even cover the case at bar." These three members of the Court would have reversed on the merits.

C. Confessions and the Right to Counsel

In Blackburn v. Alabama, 80 S. Ct. 274, the Court unanimously held that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was violated when an Alabama court admitted a confession from a robbery defendant, obtained after eight or nine hours of continued questioning in a small room, filled with policemen, where no friends, relatives or counsel were present and where there was a strong probability that the defendant was at the time insane.

Blackburn, a Negro, was convicted of the robbery of a store on April 19, 1948. At the time of the alleged crime, he was a mental patient at a Veterans Administration hospital, where he was being treated for paranoid schizophrenia and from which he was on an unauthorized leave.

After his arrest and confession, a lunacy commission unanimously found that he was insane. He was then sent to a mental hospital where, except for a brief escape, he remained from 1948 to 1952 at which time he was declared competent to stand trial.

At his trial, Blackburn pleaded not guilty, and not guilty by reason of insanity. He testified that he could remember nothing of the alleged crime or its surrounding circumstances, his confession, or the early period of his treatment at the hospital. The confession was admitted over objection by counsel, who introduced depositions and other documents attesting to Blackburn's insanity both at the time of the alleged robbery and at the time of the confession. The state relied on the testimony of the Chief Deputy Sheriff as to the circumstances of the confession and that of one of the lunacy commission doctors who changed his earlier opinion that Blackburn was insane.

In an opinion by Chief Justice Warren (with Justice Clark concurring only in the result), the Court concluded that the confession was involuntary. It noted that it had previously held that psychological coercion may be as violative of due process as physical coercion. The record as a whole made it clear that the confession was not "the product of a rational intellect and a free will."

A defendant's right to compel a court to appoint a trial counsel was expanded by the Supreme Court's 7-2 decision in Hudson v. North Carolina, 80 S. Ct. 1314.

Hudson was one of three co-defendants indicted for robbery. Only one of the defendants, Cain, was represented by an attorney. The court refused Hudson's request for court-appointed counsel and, when Cain's attorney offered to represent all three, the court advised against it, suggesting a conflict of interest. Before the end of the trial, in the presence of the jury, Cain was allowed to plead guilty to a misdemeanor charge, for which he received a six-month suspended sentence. The trial of Hudson and the other defendant continued. Both were found guilty of larceny from the person, a felony, but less serious than robbery. Hudson was sentenced to 3 to 5 years in jail. He later brought a proceeding under the state's Post-Conviction Hearing Act in which he was represented by counsel. From the denial of relief in that proceeding he appealed to the Supreme Court.

Justice Stewart, speaking for the majority, accepted the state court's finding that Hudson, though only 18 years old, had sufficient intelligence and experience to handle his case and that, therefore, his youth alone did not make the failure to appoint counsel a denial of due process. However, he said, Cain's guilty plea before the jury created a prejudicial situation. At that point, Hudson needed counsel, as shown by the fact that he failed to request a mistrial, special instruction or other action designed to reduce the prejudicial effect of the guilty plea. "We hold that the circumstances which thus arose during the course of the petitioner's trial made this a case where the denial of counsel's assistance operated to deprive the defendant of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment."

Justice Clark's dissent, joined in by Justice Whittaker, questioned whether Cain's guilty plea prejudiced Hudson. If anything, Justice Clark argued, the fact that Cain was allowed to plead guilty to a lesser charge favored Hudson, since the jury convicted Hudson of only larceny from the person even though "the record here would clearly support a verdict of guilty on the robbery charge."

D. Fair Trial

In what has become known as the "Shuffling Sam" case, the Supreme Court issued a writ of certiorari directly to a trial court - the Police Court of Louisville, Ky. - and reversed its decision. Thompson v. City of Louisville, 80 S. Ct. 624.

Two policemen arrested Thompson for "loitering" in a Louisville cafe. There was evidence that he had been there a little over half an hour and had not bought anything. He was "out there on the floor dancing by himself." After arresting Thompson, the policemen said he argued with them and so they added a disorderly conduct charge. He was convicted of both charges and fined $10.00 for each offense.

Thompson claimed that his conviction violated his constitutional rights since it was reached without any evidence to support it. However, he could not appeal to a higher Kentucky court because Kentucky law does not allow appeals from so small a penalty. Consequently, he appealed directly to the United States Supreme Court, which has jurisdiction to review decisions of "the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had" - in this case the police court.

Justice Black wrote the opinion for a unanimous Supreme Court, reversing and remanding the case on the ground that there was not merely insufficient evidence but that there was no evidence to support either conviction and that Thompson was thereby deprived of liberty and property without due process of law. The Court concluded that the city, in order to prove the loitering charge, had to show that Thompson could not "give a satisfactory account of himself while loitering in the cafe, without consent of the manager."

Thompson claimed he was waiting for a bus and was able to show that he had on his person at the time a bus schedule indicating that a bus to his home would stop within one half block of the cafe an hour later. He was doing nothing otherwise illegal in the cafe. The manager testified that he was welcome there. There was no evidence that his alleged argument after the arrest disturbed the peace. In fact, Kentucky law required him to object to the arrest at that time or else forfeit his right to complain later that the arrest was unlawful. There was no contrary evidence tending to show the truth of the charges.

Quoting its 1937 decision in De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, that "conviction upon a charge not made would be sheer denial of due process," the Court concluded, "so is it a violation of due process to convict and punish a man without evidence of his guilt."

A closely divided Supreme Court held, in Schaffer v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 945, rehear. den., 80 S. Ct. 1605, that defendants properly joined in one indictment may continue to be tried together even though the trial court had already dismissed the one count that originally justified the joinder. The indictment contained three substantive counts of transporting in interstate commerce goods known to have been stolen, and one count charging conspiracy by all of the seven defendants in such transportation. Three defendants, apparently the "brains" of the transactions, all were charged in each count. Each of these three either pleaded guilty or were nolle prossed at trial. The other four defendants, who were appealing to the Supreme Court, were each charged in only one of the substantive counts and in the conspiracy count.

The conspiracy count, which was the only one justifying a joint trial under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, was dismissed for failure of proof at the close of the government's case. Each of the defendants was found guilty under the relevant substantive count.

Justice Clark, for the five-member majority, wrote that the rule relating to joinder was satisfied by the indictment and that the rule relating to severance of defendants requires a showing that prejudice would result from carrying out the joint trial. Since the trial court was careful, in charging the jury, to separate each item of evidence and to make clear that it related to but one defendant; since neither the trial court nor the Court of Appeals found that any defendant had been prejudiced by the joint trial, and since the Supreme Court has not been shown any prejudice as to any defendant, it was not error for the trial court to continue the joint trial.

Justice Douglas was joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black and Brennan in his dissent. He argued that it made "a mockery" of the rule allowing joinder where the defendants have participated "in the same series" of transactions to continue the joint trial once it is clear that there was no such joint participation. He concluded that, despite the judge's effort to keep the lines of evidence as to the various defendants clear, prejudice was all but inevitable.

In Gonzales v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 1554, the Court divided 5-4 in affirming the conviction of a member of Jehovah's Witnesses for draft evasion. In 1952, Gonzales, then eighteen years old, registered with his draft board and sought deferment as a minister of the Jehovah's Witnesses. He claimed that he devoted 100 hours a month to public preaching and 50 to 75 hours a month to other ministerial duties. He received a deferment as a conscientious objector. The following year, he substantially reduced his ministerial activities. Later that year, he was reclassified I-A. In 1956, he failed to report for induction as ordered but was not prosecuted. His case was reopened and he was again reclassified I-A.

Gonzales appealed to the Department of Justice which granted him a hearing. Thereafter, the Department recommended to the Appeal Board that the I-A classification be approved. Its recommendation, a copy of which was sent to Gonzales, noted that the local board had reported to the Department that Gonzales had claimed before it in 1956 that he was devoting 100 hours a month to preaching. Since this was clearly untrue, the Board concluded that Gonzales' apparent untrustworthiness cast doubt on his "sincerity and good faith." Gonzales promptly wrote to the Appeal Board flatly denying that he had made any such claim in 1956 or at any time since 1952, at which time it was true. The Appeals Board nevertheless confirmed the I-A classification.

Gonzales then refused to appear for induction. For this he was prosecuted, convicted and sentenced to 18 months in jail.

In appealing to the Supreme Court, Gonzales claimed that he was denied due process of law because he did not have opportunity to testify on the issue whether he made a false statement in 1956. It was not until after the Department made its recommendation that he learned about the draft board's report that he had made such a statement in 1956 or that the Department of Justice was relying on that fact. However, he conceded that he did have access to the file in his case and could have learned about the draft board's report.

Justice Clark, speaking for the 5-man majority, held that Gonzales had not been denied due process by the action of the Appeals Board in ruling against him without hearing his testimony on the disputed issue. He noted that Gonzales "never took the trouble to find out" what was in his file and that "he had ample opportunity to contest the statement before the appeal board."

Gonzales also claimed that he was wrongly denied opportunity to subpoena the notes of the Department's hearing officer as well as the original F.B.I. reports. The Court rejected this claim, noting that he did not allege that any evidence was being withheld or that any contradictions existed between the reports and the government's evidence adduced at the trial.

Chief Justice Warren wrote a dissent, supported by Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan. He relied solely on the failure to give Gonzales opportunity to testify concerning the alleged 1956 statement. The issue in the case was Gonzales' sincerity. Since Gonzales was only 22 in 1956 and was not represented by counsel, his failure to search the file for items that might be used against him was not significant. Under such circumstances, Gonzales should have had an opportunity to appear in person to explain or deny the accuracy of the evidence against him.

E. Contempt

By a 5-4 vote, the Supreme Court held that a secret trial and conviction of contempt of court is not necessarily a violation of constitutional guarantees. Levine v. United States, 80 S. Ct. 1038, rehear. den., 80 S. Ct. 1605.

Levine had refused to answer a number of questions put to him by a federal grand jury investigating violations of the Interstate Commerce Act. He was brought before a district judge. The courtroom was cleared because grand jury minutes were to be read and the court proceeding was to be a continuation of the secret grand jury hearing. Levine again refused to answer the questions when put to him by the judge. The judge then held him in contempt and sentenced him to one year in jail, without first readmitting the public to the courtroom. While Levine's counsel objected to the procedure on various grounds, he did not specifically protest the continued exclusion of the public. In the Supreme Court, Levine claimed that he could not be convicted of contempt in summary proceedings (that is, without a public trial before a jury) and that the procedure used violated the constitutional guarantee of due process.

Last year, the Supreme Court decided a case exactly like this one except that the public was readmitted to the courtroom before the finding of contempt was made. Brown v. United States, 359 U.S. 41. (See AJCongress' Summary of the 1958-1959 Term, pp. 56-57.) The Court there held, 5-4, that the use of summary contempt was proper. However, it excluded from consideration the possible effect of "secrecy" because the final action of the judge was not secret. In the present case, it considered that problem and held, by the same 5-4 vote, that the secret procedure used was permissible.

For the majority, Justice Frankfurter proceeded from the concept that the power to punish for criminal contempt is not limited by the Sixth Amendment, but only by the due process clause of, in this case, the Fifth Amendment. In such cases, "decision must turn on the particular circumstances of the case, and not upon a question-begging because abstract and absolute right to a 'public trial.'"

Here, grand jury secrecy gave way in that Levine's attorney was present at the time of the contempt, conviction and sentencing. Levine was not deprived of essential legal assistance by the secrecy. It is not urged "that publicity would in the slightest have affected the conduct of the proceedings or their result."

Justice Black's dissent, joined in by Chief Justice Warren and Justice Douglas, took issue with the concept that a criminal contempt proceeding is not a "crime" within the meaning of the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of a public trial for one charged with crime. The majority's view that the proceedings before the judge were initially a continuation of grand jury proceedings (and therefore properly secret) were also challenged. Grand jury deliberations and votes are secret but the judge is not part of the grand jury. The judge is a public figure and his actions should be public.

Justice Black also objected to the majority's reliance on the lack of prejudice. If a defendant's right to a public trial is denied, he said, it is no answer to say that "anyhow he wasn't hurt."

Justice Brennan, in a dissenting opinion joined in by Justice Douglas, stressed the Court's previous insistence that constitutional rights in criminal trials can be waived only by the defendant's express, intelligent consent.

F. Habeas Corpus

In two cases, the Supreme Court issued orders, without opinion, reversing lower court decisions denying writs of habeas corpus. In Sublett v. Adams, 80 S. Ct. 527, the petitioner had claimed that he was being held in prison without lawful authority and in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The highest court of West Virginia refused the writ without hearing any response from the state or the petitioner's arguments. In a per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court held that the facts alleged by the petitioner were sufficient to entitle him to a hearing under the 1956 deicision in Herman v. Claudy, 350 U.S. 116. Chief Justice Warren took no part in this case.

In Wilde v. Wyoming, 80 S. Ct. 900, the petitioner claimed that his plea of guilty to a charge of second degree murder was induced when he had no counsel present and that the prosecutor wilfully suppressed the testimony of two eye-witnesses to the alleged crime which would have exonerated him. Citing the Sublett as well as the Herman case, the Supreme Court, in a unanimous per curiam opinion, found that the record showed neither a hearing nor any justification for a denial of the hearing.

In a third case involving habeas corpus, the Supreme Court declined to rule on the defendant's claim, holding that the case was moot. Parker v. Ellis, 80 S. Ct. 909.

Parker was tried in a Texas state court in 1954 for forging checks. He was then 67 years old and apparently in poor health. However, the judge refused to appoint counsel to represent him. Parker's efforts to defend himself were incompetent and ineffective. He was convicted and sentenced to seven years imprisonment. After appealing unsuccessfully through the Texas judicial system, he was denied certiorari in the United States Supreme Court. He then unsuccessfully sought relief by way of habeas corpus in the Federal courts and petitioned the Supreme Court for certiorari in October, 1958. The petition was granted March 2, 1959. Four weeks later, after repeated requests by Parker which had been ignored by the courts, counsel was appointed for him. However, less than ten weeks after that, Parker was released because his sentence had run its course.

Eleven months later, the Supreme Court issued a brief per curiam opinion holding that the case was moot and that the Court was without jurisdiction. Habeas corpus, it ruled, may be granted only to inquire into the legality of a detention and the only relief authorized is discharge from custody or admission to bail. Since neither is possible here, the case must be dismissed.

Justices Harlan and Clark, in a brief concurring opinion by Justice Harlan, argued further that the conviction would not cause Parker to lose any rights since he had a number of outstanding felony convictions in other states, any of which would have the same effect under Texas law as the conviction he was appealing.

Chief Justice Warren dissented, joined by Justices Black, Douglas and Brennan. He argued that it was enough to show that Parker was in custody when the habeas corpus proceeding was started. Since he had been out of jail for more than five years at the time of the Texas trial, he had a stake in establishing his rehabilitation and reintegration in the life of the community. "Furthermore, there is an important public interest in declaring the invalidity of a conviction obtained in violation of the Constitution."

Justice Douglas filed an additional dissent, in which the Chief Justice joined. He would have employed a fiction by granting Parker relief as of the date he started the habeas corpus proceeding, at which time he was in custody.

G. Court-Martial Jurisdiction

Four cases decided on the same day put into question the constitutionality of court martial jurisdiction over civilians. Kinsella v. United States ex rel. Singleton, 80 S. Ct. 297; McElroy v. United States ex rel. Gualiardo and Wilson v. Bohlender, 80 S. Ct. 305; and Grisham v. Hagan, 80 S. Ct. 310.

The common question was whether Congress had power under the Constitution to provide for the trial by court martial of civilians connected with the armed forces. Article III and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments of the Constitution guarantee to defendants in criminal proceedings certain basic rights, including trial by jury. Article I, Section 8, clause 14, grants Congress power "to make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces." Under that clause, and the "necessary and proper" clause (Article I, Section 8, clause 18), Congress enacted Article 2(11) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which permits trial by courts martial of "persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the armed forces outside the United States." In such cases, the accused does not have trial by jury or other rights ordinarily guaranteed to criminal defendants.

In 1957, the Supreme Court held, in Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, that Article 2(11) of the Uniform Code was unconstitutional insofar as it attempted to deny constitutional rights to civilian dependents of members of the armed forces charged with capital offenses. The present cases turned on whether the 1957 holding would also apply to a civilian dependent charged with a non-capital offense (Singleton), to a civilian employee charged with a capital offense (Grisham) and to civilian employees charged with non-capital offenses (Gualiardo and Wilson, these two cases being treated together by the Court).

The defendants were upheld in all four cases. In Singleton and Grisham, the vote was 7 to 2 and in Gualiardo and Wilson it was 5 to 4. The Chief Justice and Justices Black, Douglas, Clark and Brennan were in the majority in all four cases. Justices Whittaker and Stewart concurred in the one case involving a civilian dependent but dissented in the three involving civilian employees. Justices Harlan and Frankfurter concurred in the one case involving a capital offense but dissented in the three cases involving less than capital offenses.

The majority opinion in each of the cases was written by Justice Clark (despite the fact that he had dissented in the 1957 cases).

Singleton, involved the wife of a soldier stationed in Germany who, with her husband, was convicted of involuntary manslaughter for causing the death of one of their children. The Supreme Court refused to limit its 1957 decision to capital crimes, saying that this would give the "military an unreviewable discretion to exercise jurisdiction over civilian dependents simply by downgrading the offense, thus stripping the accused of his constitutional rights and protections." It also rejected the government's contention that court martial jurisdiction over dependents was a military necessity, saying that it saw no danger to discipline in requiring trial before civil courts.

In Grisham, a civilian employee was tried by general court martial in France for premeditated murder, a capital offense. He was convicted of the lesser offense of unpremeditated murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. The Court refused to distinguish the treatment to be given civilian employees of the military in Grisham from that of civilian dependents of the military in Covert. "The awesomeness of the death penalty has no less impact when applied to civilian employees."

Guagliardo involved the conviction of a civilian electrical lineman tried by court martial in Morocco for larceny and conspiracy to commit larceny. Wilson involved a civilian auditor working for the Army who was convicted of sodomy by a general court martial in Berlin. The identical issues raised in the two cases were disposed of in a single opinion.

The Court held that the cases were controlled by the combined effect of the decisions in the other two cases. Singleton eliminated the distinction between capital and non-capital cases. Grisham eliminated the distinction between civilian dependents and civilian employees.

In all three opinions, the Court stressed its view that clause 14, since it limits basic rights guaranteed elsewhere in the Constitution, must be confined to "the least possible power adequate to the end proposed."

Justice Whittaker, with whom Justice Stewart concurred, agreed with the Court majority in the Singleton case but dissented in the other three, making a distinction between civilian dependents and civilian employees. Explaining his concurrence in Singleton, Justice Whittaker said that, if the Constitution prevented Congress from making civilian dependents subject to courts martial in capital cases, as was held in Covert in 1957, it had the same effect in all cases.

However, Justice Whittaker would have limited the holding of Covert to civilian dependents. Such persons have only a remote connection with the military establishments. But civilian employees "perform essential services for the military and, in doing so, are subject to the orders, direction and control of the same military command as the 'members' of those forces * * *."

Justice Harlan, with whom Justice Frankfurter concurred, agreed with the Court in the Grisham case but dissented in the other three, drawing a distinction between capital and non-capital offenses. The Covert decision, he argued, did not establish the proposition that non-military personnel are not within court martial jurisdiction. It held only that there is no court martial jurisdiction over civilian dependents charged with capital offenses. The "awesome finality" of capital cases require that they be subject to an elaborate array of procedural safeguards. This has led the Court in other situations to recognize special constitutional requirements in such cases.

H. Rights of Felons

New York State's right to forbid convicted felons from acting as officers or agents of labor unions connected with certain types of waterfront activity was upheld by the Supreme Court's 5-3 decision in De Veau v. Braisted, 80 S. Ct. 1146.

In 1953, Congress approved a New York-New Jersey compact creating a bi-state Waterfront Commission, with power to regulate certain types of employment. Before the compact was approved, New York enacted supplementary legislation providing that no dues or other money shall be collected by a union if any of its officers or agents have been convicted of a felony. De Veau had pleaded guilty in 1920 to a charge of grand larceny in New York and had received a suspended sentence. He was suspended from his position as secretary-treasurer after a district attorney threatened to prosecute anyone collecting dues for his union local. De Veau sued to have the statute declared unconstitutional under the Supremacy Clause and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and as an ex post facto law and a bill of attainder.

Justice Frankfurter's opinion upholding the law was joined in by Justices Clark, Whittaker and Stewart. The greater portion of the opinion was addressed to the asserted conflict between the state statute and the National Labor Relations Act and other federal labor laws which guarantee the right of employees to choose their own bargaining representatives. In finding that the state statute did not conflict with congressional policy as embodied in those laws, Justice Frankfurter relied principally on the fact that Congress had approved the compact with full knowledge of the state statute.

On the claim that the statute deprived De Veau of due process of law, Frankfurter declared that disqualification of convicted felons is "a reasonable means for achieving a legitimate state aim, namely, eliminating corruption on the waterfront." Restrictions on such persons are imposed in many fields, e. g., membership in the armed forces, service on juries, and holding of offices of honor, trust or profit under the United States.

The claim that the statute was a bill of attainder was rejected because it "embodies no further implications of appellant's [De Veau's] guilt than are contained in his 1920 judicial conviction." The ex post facto claim was denied because the disqualification was not intended as a punishment for past acts but rather as a regulation of a present situation.

Justice Brennan, the other member of the majority, concurred in a separate opinion in which he concluded that the law "is a reasonable means for achieving a legitimate state aim, and does not deny due process or otherwise violate the Federal Constitution."

Justice Douglas, joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justice Black, dissented. Without reaching the questions of due process, attainder, or ex post facto, he argued that the law clearly conflicted with the federal labor laws.

Justice Harlan took no part in this case.

ANALYSIS OF THE VOTES OF THE INDIVIDUAL JUSTICES

The Tables below present the votes of the individual Justices during the 1959-1960 Term in the civil liberties and civil rights cases described above, and certain cumulative material for the last Terms. The thirty-five cases covered here are those bearing numbers in the Table of Contents. The cases described above which are not discussed here are those in which the Court either denied review or took other action which did not finally dispose of the matter.

Each vote is recorded as being favorable (F) or unfavorable (U) to the person claiming a constitutional or other civil right. Where different grounds were advanced for favoring the asserted right, FB indicates a favorable vote on broad grounds and FN a favorable vote on narrow grounds. We believe that this method of classification, based on whether the person asserting the right was favored, is relatively objective. It is not intended to embody any assumption that the person asserting that his rights were infringed was necessarily correct.

Table I gives the Court's disposition of the 35 cases covered here, divided into four categories. Table II gives the votes of the individual Justices in these cases. Tables III and IV cumulate the material in the first two Tables for the last three Terms of the Court. (We chose the last three Terms for the cumulative tables because there was only one change in Court personnel during that period.)

Table I shows that the Court is still deciding a majority of the civil rights and civil liberties cases that come before it favorably to the asserted right. Of the 35 cases during the last Term covered here, 21 were decided favorably and 14 unfavorably. For the three year period, as shown in Table III, the figures are 79 decided favorably and 56 unfavorably.

Tables II and IV show a continuation of the division of the Court into two blocs, a conservative group of five (Justices Frankfurter, Clark, Harlan, Whittaker, and Stewart) and a liberal group of four (Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black, Douglas, and Brennan). The Justices are listed in Table II in the order of the proportion of favorable to unfavorable votes during the last Term. There is a sharp break between the first four and the last five, with very little variation within the two groups. Table IV, which gives the corresponding figures for three years, shows the same sharp break. The greater variation within the two groups in the cumulative figures reflects the increased polarity of the last Term. It is worth noting that Justice Clark's position in Table IV, showing the highest proportion of unfavorable votes, is due largely to his votes during the 1957-1958 Term.

In Tables V, VI, and VII, we give the votes of each of the Justices in each of the cases affecting civil rights, freedom of expression, and other criminal proceedings, respectively. The cases are listed as they are numbered, with their full citations, in the Table of Contents.

No Table was prepared for the internal security cases because all but one were decided by the same 5-4 vote and the fifth (Nelson, No. 9) was decided 5-3 with the Chief Justice not participating. The consistency of the Court in this politically sensitive area was quite striking. It was not matched by its votes in other types of cases. It might be noted that, while there were 17 cases in this category in the 1957-1958 Term, there were only seven the following year and five this year.

Civil rights and freedom of expression cases have arisen with relatively constant frequency in the last three Terms. The Court has generally voted favorably in these fields. During the 1959-1960 Term however, one civil rights case, (Wolfe, No. 7) was decided unfavorably by a 5-4 vote and, in another case (Larche, No. 4), the Court voted 7-2 to uphold a provision in the 1957 Civil Rights Act, thereby rejecting a claim that the Act violated basic civil liberties.

During the three-year period there have been nine immigration and nationality cases (in addition to those listed under internal security). Of these, five were decided unfavorably. There was no case during the past year that could be classified under this heading in the Tables.

The category of other criminal proceedings, which has somewhat the nature of a miscellaneous category, shows the least consistency in voting patterns. During the past year, 12 of the 19 cases in this group were decided favorably. The overall figure for three years is 33 favorable decisions to 32 unfavorable.

This Term's polarization is shown most clearly in Table VIII which lists the twelve cases decided by 5-4 votes. The percentage of such divisions increased substantially over the 1958-1959 Term (12 out of 35 as against 10 out of 43). In addition, Nelson, No. 9, and Easton, No. 21 (decided unfavorably by 5-3 and 4-4 votes, respectively), adhered to the usual 5-4 pattern, except for one judge not participating in each case. It will be seen that in none of these cases did a member of the liberal bloc cast an unfavorable vote. In only three of these cases was the liberal group able to win a favorable result by obtaining the adherence of a member of the other side of the Court -- Justice Stewart in two search and seizure cases (Rios, No. 18, and Elkins, No. 19) and Justice Clark in a court-martial case (Gualiardo, No. 33). In the 1958-1959 Term also, those two judges were the only members of the conservative bloc to cross over in 5-4 cases.

In the only case in which six favorable votes were cast, a freedom of expression case, the liberal bloc was joined by Justices Stewart and Harlan (Talley, No. 14). In all, in the cases decided favorably to the asserted right by a divided Court, the judges of the liberal bloc were joined by Justice Stewart six times, Justice Harlan four times, Justices Frankfurter and Clark three times, and Justice Whittaker twice. In the cases decided unfavorably by a divided Court, the defections from the liberal bloc came from Justice Brennan twice and Chief Justice Warren once.

Despite the high proportion of 5-4 decisions, there was also a substantial number of unanimous decisions. While the proportion of such decisions was reduced somewhat from the previous Term, it was still substantially above that of the 1957-1958 Term. Of the thirty-five cases tabulated here, fourteen (40%) were decided unanimously, thirteen favorably and one unfavorably to the claimed right. In the 1958-1959 Term, 19 of the 43 cases (47%) were decided unanimously, while in the 1957-1958 Term, only 14 of 57 cases (25%) were so decided.

Dear George:

I am sending you under separate cover a copy of the latest edition of the AJCongress -- NAACP Balance Sheet of Group Relations, "Civil Rights in the United States, 1953." I am sure that you have become familiar with it over the past few years and will agree with me that it is indeed a unique reference work and an invaluable research tool for anyone working in the field of intergroup relations. In recognition of this, many civil rights organizations throughout the country have placed with us substantial orders for it (some several hundred at a time) and have distributed copies to public officials, to members of group relations commissions, and to professional workers in civic, labor and intergroup relations agencies and the like.

In view of the great expansion of your program throughout the South and in connection with the historic segregation decision recently handed down by the Supreme Court, it is our hope that you will be in a position to order a large supply of Balance Sheets for the use of your people. In any educational undertaking such as yours the Balance Sheet cannot but be a tremendous asset. As a matter of fact, it is for just such organizations as yours and for the work that you are doing, that it has been prepared for the last six years.

Do let us hear from you soon.

Cordially yours,

Will

Subject: Reorganization of AJCongress Staff

There has been a reorganization within the staff of the American Jewish Congress and a reallocation of duties and responsibilities. I have been appointed Director of the Department of Public Affairs of the American Jewish Congress which supervises the work of three commissions: the Commission on Law and Social Action, the Commission on Community Interrelations and the Commission on Internal Affairs and on Israel. Leo Pfeffer has been appointed Director of the Commission on Law and Social Action; Dr. Don Hager, Director of the Commission on Community Interrelations; and Dr. Edward Glick, Director of the Commission on International Affairs and of Israel.

To standardize procedures and make for prompt replies to any requests you may have for assistance from us, I would suggest that you write initially to the Directors of the respective Commissions in regard to any matter within the scope of activities of their Commissions.

I will, of course, be happy to hear from any of you at any time.

Dear Will:

Thanks for your recent letter suggesting that SRC stage a conference on Negro suffrage in the South. While the proposal in itself is a good one, I think that the objective is being largely achieved down here through more piecemeal methods. Let me summarize these briefly and see if you agree:

(1) The Southern interagency group, which last met on November 5 - 6, spent a good deal of time on the subject of voting. We heard what the NAACP is planning and discussed the parts that each of our agencies could play in the overall effort to increase registration of qualified Negroes.

(2) As you probably know, the NAACP just held a major planning conference on voting here in Atlanta.

(3) SRC is convening a region-wide group of leading white church women to plan ways in which their constituents can be activated as observers at their community registration offices. Our hope is that various of the church women's groups will make this a part of their formal program for the coming year.

(4) Our several agencies are committed to gathering and pooling all evidence they can get on evidence of official intent to disfranchise and actual instances of voting discrimination.

It does occur to me that your idea might better be furthered by a national meeting, with the NAACP and/or one or two of the national agencies as conveners. If such a meeting were undertaken, we'd be glad to cooperate in every way.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Dear Harold:

Your recent excellent pamphlet on Negro suffrage prompts me to suggest to you that the SRC convene a conference on Negro suffrage in the South.

The conference would have the following functions:

1) To determine how the Negroes of the South can best be encouraged to vote.
2) To consider the best method of attacking obstructions on the right to vote.
3) To determine how best to stimulate the Federal administration to vigorous enforcement of the new Civil Rights Act.

It should be attended by the following:

1) representatives of all Southern agencies concerned with the problem, including church groups.
2) representatives of all the Southern Negro associations that are interested in increasing Negro registration and Negro voting.
3) representatives of Northern agencies such as ACLU, AJCongress, ADL, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, etc.
4) representatives of the NAACP.

It should even be possible to get a grant from some foundation to cover all expenses.

I would appreciate your reactions to this proposal and whether you think any practical benefit would be derived from it.

Sincerely,

Will

SUMMARY OF "PSYCHIATRIC ASPECTS OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION"

A REPORT ISSUED BY THE GROUP FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF PSYCHIATRY, 1957

SUMMARY OF "PSYCHIATRIC ASPECTS OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION,"

A REPORT ISSUED BY THE GROUP FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF PSYCHIATRY, 1957.

I. Introduction

Desegregation is not merely a legal problem. It is also a social problem, an economic one, and above all a psychological problem. Were it not for the irrational fears and prejudice associated with it in the minds of many Americans, both in the North and in the South, the legal, economic and social difficulties would be easier to solve.

II. Psychological Ills Resulting from Segregation

A. The individual

The effects of segregation upon the Negro are obvious. It causes him humiliation, it relegates him to second-class citizenship, it denies him free and equal economic, social and political opportunities, and it denies him the right to develop whatever inner potentials he may possess. As a result, his capacity to learn and to aspire are seriously limited.

The white person, too, suffers as a result of segregation -- in a less obvious way. Many white persons gain a false feeling of superiority merely by imagining that they are "better than the Negroes." Such an evaluation of oneself is unreal and produces a false sense of one's worth. It also breeds expressions of hostility and aggression between white and Negro. Anxiety that may spring from other problems finds its outlet in such hostility; this makes it more difficult to treat the real cause of the anxiety.

B. The community

Segregation is not only harmful to individuals but is equally harmful to the whole community. Segregated schools, for example, provide inferior and inadequate educational facilities for the Negro and keep him from gaining the full advantage of free educational opportunities. Segregated housing creates black ghetto slums which breed crime, delinquency, disease, etc. Discrimination in employment and education force the Negro into the lowest rung on the economic ladder and this in turn helps to reinforce the slum conditions where Negroes reside. These social ills moreover are not confined to the segregated part of the community. They affect the whole community. Disease, poor housing, inadequate health service, delinquency and crime can never be confined to any single section of a town or city. Criminals can move freely into any section of the community; and disease knows no barriers or residential boundaries. Segregation moreover, produces racial tension which by its very nature affects the entire community.

C. Country

A chronic state of racial tension drains off the energies of a country - energies that might otherwise be applied more constructively. The existence of a large proportion of our population in an economically, educationally and socially under-developed state robs the country as a whole of a substantial part of its human resources. Segregation moreover lessens the prestige of the United States abroad especially among the non-white peoples of the world. The United States cannot win support in the great struggle between East and West unless it demonstrates to the world at large that it puts into practice the principles of democracy which it preaches so vigorously.

III. Racial Myths and Prejudice

A. The creation of the myths

Myths and rationalizations are always developed as a defense mechanism whenever a person suffers mental confusion as a result of a conflict. The psychiatrist explains that the formation of this myth "provides a rational answer to what appears to be an insoluble problem." In the United States we have had to rationalize between our great belief in equality and Christian principles and our actual treatment of the Negro. To solve this dilemma we have created various myths about the Negroes - depicting them as "little better than savage animals, irresponsible, intellectually inferior, unable to control excessive sexual impulses, etc." Having created such myths it becomes easier to discriminate and subjugate the Negro, for we are now able to assure ourselves that the principles of the Constitution cannot possibly apply to "savage animals of inferior intellect."

B. Myths and their effect on Negro-White relationships

1. Group relations

Segregation of the Negro and white, reinforced by the existence of such "myths" has been accompanied by a generally recognized difference in the social status of the two groups. Merely by being a member of a white group an individual receives special privileges; and merely by being a member of a Negro group, one is deprived of these privileges and is treated as a second-class citizen. Many highly educated Negroes, for example, are forced to show deference to a white person merely because of the color of this person's skin.

This difference in social status moreover creates differences in political power and economic status. It forces the Negro to work in less desirable jobs with less pay, longer hours with more menial tasks to perform. It robs the Negro of political strength and excludes him from many government positions of authority. As a result the myth of Negro inferiority is reinforced by social reality. For those who believe in the myth of Negro inferiority can point to the inferior social, economic and political condition of the Negro and say "I am right; Negroes are inferior; look how they live."

2. Personal relationships

a) Uncle Tom role

Personal relationships between Negroes and whites are also affected by the existence of these myths. The white person thinks that the Negro should be fun loving, loyal and capable of hard work, etc. Conversely the white person should be diligent, plan for the future, be independent, a leader, and utilize Negroes for hard work. The Negro is expected to repress his natural drives in order to live up to the mythical roles created for him; and the white person is expected to force the Negro to continue in these roles through threats, fears or paternal protectiveness. This kind of unreal relationship is bound to cause anger, resentment and fear between Negro and white.

b) False sense of security

On the deepest personal level believing in the myth of white supremacy and Negro inferiority helps a white person to gain a sense of self-esteem and security. Unfortunately, the use of the myth as a defense against insecurity is self-defeating. It does not really solve the reasons for a person's anxiety and insecurity. Unfortunately many Negroes themselves unconsciously begin to believe the myth. If a child is repeatedly treated as if he were no better than a dirty stupid animal, he will either come to believe this or develop defenses against it. This explains the reaction of some Negroes who feel dirty because of their skin color or who feel guilty of the efforts of Negro leaders to fight for equality.

C. Fears relating to sex

The higher social status group commonly considers the lower group as more primitive - and as more potent sexually. (This is true not only of Negro-white relationships but also as between various class levels. The lower economic class is always classified as more potent.) Thus, according to popular folklore, all Negro males are extremely potent sexually; and all Negro females are sexually more responsive. There are no facts to support this.

The jealousy and fear of the white male inflamed by this myth of Negro potency was responsible for the creation of the white supremacy codes set up ostensibly to protect white women. These codes provide the most savage reprisals against Negro men who are charged with having or desiring sex relations with white women. It is interesting to note, however, that these codes also provide immunity to the white male who has sex relations with a Negro female.

The fear and hatred founded and maintained by racial sex mythology has entered so deeply into the emotions of many Southerners, that it has formed a psychological barrier against the Negroes. The image of the oversexed Negro to the white Southerner is very real and very frightening. It will probably outlast any sudden removal of the psychical barriers of segregation. This myth is all the more difficult to correct because certain surface facts do seem to make it agree with objective reality. For example, studies show that extensive sexual behavior is far more prevalent among low-social-economic classes with disorganized family living. The Negro is by and large a member of this "low socio -economic class." Any extensive or impulsive sexual behavior by the Negro is due to this fact and not to the color of his skin. Once this is understood the problem of Negro-white relationships can be more constructively dealt with.

D. Extra marital and marital relationships

The fear of intermarriage and the desire to preserve racial purity are always important arguments in defense of segregation. Actually when you test these arguments factually and rationally they fall apart. The mixing of white and Negro genes has been going on for many hundreds of years. There are no pure races. "Mankind has always been and still is a mongrel lot." Out-of-wedlock relationships between the races have always been a part of our social structure - particularly in cases where the man is white and the female is Negro. If the white Southerner was truly interested in preserving the purity of the white race - he would be as concerned with these extra marital relationships as he is with the marriage relationships. As matters stand, he is not. The Negro female mistress and the white male relationship has always been an accepted part of the Southern "way of life." It has produced and will continue to produce racial intermingling. In fact, 78 per cent of the United States Negroes who were interviewed in a recent survey testified to some white or Indian ancestry. Those who oppose school integration today on the ground that it will lead to racial mixture, fail to recognize that this is already an accomplished fact.

There is no evidence, moreover, that integration will produce more intermarriage. The expectation voiced by many people that school desegregation will result in a great rise in the rate of intermarriage seems to be an expression of their bias and fear, rather than a reliable prediction. As a matter of fact, the information on which to base predictions with regard to racial intermarriage is extremely sparse and rather confusing.

The most authoritative current work on the subject of intermarriage, "Negro-White Intermarriage in Recent Times," by Wirth, Louis Goldhamer and Herbert opens with the statement, "Only limited and unsatisfactory data are available on Negro-white intermarriage in the United States. The many factors that determine fluctuations in the rate of racial intermarriage are far from clear. In Boston, where legal school desegregation has been in effect for decades, there was a relatively high rate in the years immediately after 1900 and a marked decrease in the next decades despite a constant ratio of Negroes to the total population. In urban New York State, other than New York City, the ratio climbed between 1916-1924 and then dropped steadily for the next ten years. No satisfactory explanation for this shift has been established. The facts conclude that legal school desegregation per se does not influence the rate of intermarriage in ways that are yet predictable."

Perhaps integration will produce greater mutuality and shared experiences between whites and Negroes. If this occurs, it would not necessarily alter the present course of biological mixing which is going on any way through extra marital relationships. One might expect, however, that there may be a shift from illicit interracial union to the more legalized unions of marriage.

IV. Attitude Changes

A. Introduction

Reaction to the Supreme Court decision on desegregation has varied from community to community throughout the South. In some areas it has met with violent opposition; in many other areas it is being implemented peacefully. It is wrong to assume, however, that even in areas where it is being implemented peacefully, that there are marked changes in peoples attitudes. Such attitude changes involve many psychological processes and cannot be quickly changed by court decisions or legislation.

B. Goals of attitude changes

Ideally the ultimate goal of relationships between Negroes and whites would be to accept the Negro as an individual not as a member of a group; to accept him as a human being entitled to all the rights and privileges that belong to all human beings. It is unrealistic to expect that this goal will be acheived among our current adult generation. It would require a fundamental change in attitudes; and such a change requires a complete restructuring of a personality. The way a person feels and reacts to a minority group is intimately tied up with how he feels towards himself, his family, his friends, etc. A good deal depends on the experiences and impressions he received as a child. These cannot be radically changed in most cases without individual psychological help. While we should work toward the ultimate goal, therefore, we should not be disappointed if the change in attitudes is more limited than what we would like to see achieved in this generation.

C. Increase of hostility

In many areas the Supreme Court decision has led to increased anti-Negro hostility. This may be due to a fear of Negro retaliation if and when the Negro could break out of his shackles. There is no evidence to support this fear. The Negroes have been resorting to lawful action, community mobilization and to a non-violent passive resistance sponsored largely by the Negro churches.

D. Stages in attitude changes

1. A first stage in a change in attitude between whites and Negroes is a mental process called "compartmentalization." For example, in Northern housing projects Negroes and whites will live next door to each other in friendly relationships without any tension; and yet a white person living in such a project may object to being called by his first name by the Negro publicly in the streets. Another example of compartmentalization is the case of the white parents that have no objections to having their children go to the same school as Negroes - yet they do not want them to visit with each other socially. This attitude is clearly an inbetween stage in the acceptance of desegregation.

2. Denial of differences. Another inbetween stage consists of denying that there are any differences between Negroes and whites. This is unreal; there are differences - due to the vastly different life patterns that both groups are subject to. To deny this difference can be dangerous. For example, Negro children in an integrated school may need special care and guidance to stimulate increased inspiration and motivation. Knowing a child's race like knowing his age or sex could help meet his special educational needs. Acceptance of differences can be constructive and need not imply inferiority.

3. Mascot attitudes. A third inbetween stage consists of overdoing one's admiration for Negro talents - their cuteness, their gift of music, their gayety, etc. White persons in this group are usually proud when they invite Negroes to their home. They do not realize that by behaving in this way they are not treating the Negro as an individual. They are actually overlooking his real attributes and are employing fantasies in their acceptance.

E. How do you handle people going through these different stages?

All of these inbetween stages are steps forward in the acceptance of the Negro. The big question is how do you handle persons in these inbetween stages so as to promote further changes in their basic attitudes. There are two ways. (1) To aim at increasing a person's awareness of the nature of this inbetween stage or (2) by leaving him alone on the assumption that each stage has its own specific function and needs to run its course before people are ready to move on. There is no hard or fast rule that can be established about which method is more effective. Each case must be handled on its own facts. It is important to remember, however, that in each stage discussed above there is a readiness to move forward. The speed with which adults reach each stage will affect the manner in which their children will develop a new orientation toward other groups.

F. The effect of the "group" on attitudes

1. The need to be part of a group

Everyone needs to belong to various groups; and these groups play an important role in influencing behavior and attitudes. The family, the church, the community, voluntary organizations - all of these exert powerful influences in shaping attitudes.

2. Taking a stand

There are always mixed reasons for people taking a stand. It may be the result of group pressure, it may be in order to gain approval; or it may be due to fear of authority, etc. One thing is clear. It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for most individuals to take sides on an issue against the overwhelming majority of the local community, unless they have some direct personal support from at least one or two members of the community.

3. Public and private attitudes

Many times people express one attitude in public and other attitudes in private - with wide discrepancy between the public and private attitude. A person's public statements are influenced by his immediate interests and may change with each situation. He may want to get on the bandwagon because it is expedient. Usually a person will try to rationalize this public attitude making it appear altruistic.

4. Reenforcing convictions.

Once a person has made his decision - he usually tries to find arguments to reenforce it. Many times the more doubtful he is about his attitude the more he will suppress the doubt and become a vigorous supporter of the position he espouses.

5. The need for community planning in integration programs.

The points discussed above indicate the need for communities to develop clear-cut policies on integration and to plan carefully on all levels to effectuate a smooth transition from segregated to desegregated schools. The school boards, the church, the voluntary agencies, all must give public support to desegregation. This helps shape the attitudes of the individuals in the community. It helps assure them that they have support for their position - support reinforced by authority.

G. The role of authority in changing attitudes

1. The Southern white is faced with a dilemma; what government authority should he obey. Should he obey the Federal government, the state government, the school district, etc. There are different levels of authority which confuse him. He is more prone to obey that authority which is nearest - because it is more real and closer to him.

2. Many times implies enforcement of authority. This threat of coercion (imaginary or real) may lead to open defiance. It is natural for people to respond defiantly against authority.

3. There is no question that the white citizen in the South is faced with conflicting authority and pressures. That is why he is more susceptible to the influence of a leader. He needs somebody to help him decide on the position to take. His own feelings towards authority are mixed and confused. His final attitudes depend on the balance of these conflicts and which ones are stronger and more persuasive to him.

4. The place of the leader in this field, therefore, has become extremely important. There are all kinds of leaders coming to the fore in the integration struggle. Their motives are mixed; they range from the most socially altruistic to the crudest personal aggrandizement. Training leaders in recognition of the role they must play in the present desegregation crisis can help in establishing constructive action for integration.

5. Participation of citizens in government

When we consider the use of government authority in enforcing segregation we must take into account two features. One is the fact that the Negro is disenfranchised in the South and political power is kept in the hands of the whites. The second fact to be considered is the philosophy of states' rights which is still significant in the South. States' rights are tied up with self-respect and independence in the South. The Southerner reacts badly against being "told to do something" by Northern outsiders. Many people feel that the citizens of the South would accept integration more effectively if they participated in the decisions which they were told to implement.

The Southern white must be made aware of the fact that the decision of the United States Supreme Court was made democratically; for the Supreme Court represents all the people of our country, North and South. He must be made aware of the fact that to permit him to continue to damage his fellow citizen (the Negro) is as unthinkable as to guarantee him the freedom to kill and to steal.

It is clear, however, that integration will be achieved most effectively where school boards, PTAs and local citizens' groups become involved in the whole process. They must be called upon to help make the decisions as to the methods of integration. They must be given a feeling that they have "a say in the matter."

V. The Responses of Various Groups to Desegregation

What are the psychological consequences of school desegregation for the various groups intimately involved?

A. The children

1. The adjustment for the Negro child is a difficult one. Some children feel a sense of rejection marked by increased hostility and fear. However, as soon as a favorable school climate is produced, the children's racial loyalties can be expected to give way to school and white identification.

2. In the initial steps of adjustment there will be many different individual reactions among the children - depending on each child's specific history. For example, a child who feels unloved and unjustly dealt with in its family will often identify strongly with children in the larger "school family" whom he imagines are also unloved and unjustly dealt with. New experiences, however, with important adult figures at school may do much toward putting a child on the pathway toward resolving old conflicts and developing a better integrated concept of himself.

3. Becoming a member of a new group often stirs up a whole sequence of behavior mechanisms. Some individuals react to the impact of their newness in a group by over expectation of acceptance, thus making many mistakes in group behavior which they would not have made in their old groups. Others tend to develop near-paranoid interpretations of the behavior by the group expecting rejection even where none occurs, or by imagining that they are being mistreated when they are not. Some hide behind a cloak of shyness, and withdraw from participation in the group. A teacher must be aware of these different reactions in order to help the child.

4. Unfortunately, at present the achievement levels of white and Negro children of the same age vary widely in most communities. The quality of teaching and school equipment have been inferior for the Negro child. This has been coupled with a poorer educational level of the parents, as well as less developed intellectual and cultural interests. Consequently, children in Negro schools are at a disadvantage when compared with children of the same grade from white schools. I.Q. levels in the two groups may also be different. Proponents of segregation point to this as evidence of innate inequality, while integrationists attribute it to inferior opportunity. The consensus of expert opinion, as expressed by leading scientific organizations and the vast majority of recognized social science authorities, is that there is no scientific evidence of inborn difference in intelligence between Negroes and whites. There is general recognition that the school achievement of Negro children, especially from segregated schools, is lower on the average than white children, although some Negro children do better than the average white child.

5. A final source of difficulty which may be mentioned is the fact that in some desegregated schools groups of children may be thrown together who, because of socio-economic differences and incompatibilities of personality type, would not mix regardless of their ethnic origin. For instance, middle-class, conforming children, whether white or Negro, will have trouble integrating with predelinquent, aggressive children from an underprivileged group. Such troubles may be falsely explained as racial when they are primarily social and psychological.

B. The educator

This period will be a difficult period for teachers and educators. Certainly teachers are not immune from the conflicted attitudes which beset the rest of the population in regard to race relations and desegregation. It is particularly important to emphasize that well-intentioned efforts to overlook the problems for the sake of surface harmony are likely to prove harmful in the long run. Children are particularly sensitive to conflicts in basic attitudes between adults. In the home, such conflicts between parents are observed by a child and lead to disturbed behavior even when parents fondly believe they have concealed them by "never quarreling in front of the children." So, too, in school, conflicting attitudes in a teacher, or opposing attitudes between teachers, even when kept from open expression, may cause loyalty struggles in the children which will interfere with learning. Wise leadership in the school must, therefore, provide opportunities for airing and resolving the inevitable differences which realistically can be expected to arise.

C. The parents

Although children are directly involved in school desegregation, their attitudes and behavior are largely affected by their parents.

White parents may fear that academic standards will be lowered by the admission of Negro children, or that the child or family will lose status in the community, or that their children will be exposed to lower moral standards and to communicable diseases. White parents may also have fears in regard to relatively direct contact with Negro parents, at parent-teacher meetings, etc.

Negro parents, having no less concern for the welfare and future of their children, are also affected by doubts and fears regarding desegregation. Will their children be able to compete satisfactorily in a desegregated school with higher standards? Will they receive fair and impartial treatment from the teachers? Will the white children hurt them physically or emotionally? What indignities should they, the parents, anticipate in attending a parent-teacher meeting?

Some of the apprehensions of parents are realistic, at least in part, but the evidence provided by studies of areas which have been desegregated indicates that some of these fears dissipate quickly when experience demonstrates either that they were ill-founded or that the new problems can be solved. For example, research studies of desegregated housing in previously segregated areas suggest that there is an initial feeling of loss of status on the part of white tenants which corrects itself rather quickly. After an initial sense of loss of status, the tenants' individual feelings adjusted themselves to the realities of everyday living (as had happened throughout their lives in other situations). The signs of a sense of loss of status disappeared.

White parents with fears of loss of status may also be reassured by reports from areas where school desegregation has taken place, which indicate that status problems may be lessened by making attendance at desegregated schools not a matter of personal decision, but requiring desegregation of all the schools of a given community. Partial desegregation apparently encourages resistance. When all schools are desegregated, no child has a special advantage or handicap.

The fact that many Negro children will be relatively backward academically is primarily a problem for the school teachers and administrators. All good integration programs provide special guidance, counselling for the minority child, enriched programs, smaller classes, etc. to help bridge the gap between the white and Negro child. Educators will need strong support from parents in meeting this problem. Gifted children of either race need not suffer academically from desegregation unless overcrowding, poor teaching, or other educational handicaps are present.

Similar considerations should lessen fears of white parents that their children may suffer a lowering of moral standards or catch communicable diseases from the Negro children. Neither delinquency nor communicable diseases are primarily related to race. Both are directly related to the complex social, psychological, and economic forces that form the ingredients of the pattern of inferior status of the Negro. As segregation and discrimination is lessened, you will find a similar decrease in delinquency, crime, diseases, etc. among Negro children.

Dear Will:

Thank you for your two recent letters.

We appreciate very much your sending us the names of the liberal Dallasites whom Judge Justine Wise Polier met there recently. When a member of our staff is next in Dallas, we shall be in touch with them.

As to legal advice, our silence to date does not mean that the need has been met. However, the civil liberties question which is pressing us most heavily right now arises from the threat of police action against interracial meetings in Birmingham. What is needed there is not so much legal analysis as advice and possible representation by local legal counsel. We have been in communication with Rowland Watts of ACLU on this matter, but so far it has not been resolved.

As situations come to the fore that call for analysis of legislation, administrative actions, or court rulings, we will no doubt be calling on you. It's good to know that the resources of the American Jewish Congress are available for this purpose.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

RE: Southern Bombings

Six bombings or attempted bombings of Jewish synagogues and community centers in Florida, Tennessee, Alabama and North Carolina have taken place in the last six months. The consensus of expert opinion is that only intervention by the Federal government and particularly by the FBI can prevent other dynamite assaults or lead to the arrests of those responsible for these criminal outrages. Attached is a memorandum by Will Maslow analyzing the absolute refusal of the U.S. Attorney General to allow the FBI to intervene. Attached also is a copy of a telegram by Dr. Israel Goldstein to Attorney General Rogers urging such intervention.

The position of the Attorney General has been challenged by the United States Senators from Alabama, Florida and Tennessee. It can be reversed if public opinion is sufficiently aroused. It is imperative therefore that

1. Telegrams be sent to your Senators and Representatives urging them to communicate with the Attorney General requesting an FBI investigation of the Southern bombings.

2. Telegrams be sent to your Representatives urging them to support H.R. 11806 (described in the attached reprint of a letter to the New York Times), a bill introduced by Rep. J. Carlton Loser of Nashville. The Loser bill would eliminate doubts as to the FBI's jurisdiction to investigate these bombings. Hearings on the Loser bill will be held shortly by a House Judiciary Subcommittee.

3. Write to your local newspaper urging such an FBI investigation and to your local radio stations urging public discussion of this issue.

4. Try to obtain similar statements and support for an FBI investigation from non-Jewish organizations, religious bodies, and labor, veteran and service associations. Attached is a copy of a telegram from Dr. Edwin T. Dahlberg, president of the National Council of Churches of Christ In The U.S.A., to the Attorney General urging an FBI investigation.

We would appreciate receiving copies of any reply you may receive from your Senators or Representatives.

May 2, 1958

Hon. William P. Rogers
Attorney General
Washington 25, D.C.

Six bombings and attempted bombings of Jewish places of worship in Alabama, Florida, North Carolina and Tennessee have occurred in the last six months. No arrests have yet been made. There is evidence suggesting the possibility, if not the likelihood, that these incidents are interconnected and that they are all the work of a single group operating in a number of states and calling itself "The Confederate Underground." It appears also that the incidents are connected with equally outrageous assaults upon the Negro community of the South and a particularly crude effort to intimidate a Federal judge.

The American Jewish Congress has learned from the office of Mayor Hayden Burns of Jacksonville, Fla., that you have rejected a request, transmitted to you by both Florida senators, that you send a representative of the Department of Justice to attend a conference tomorrow to consider means of dealing with this outbreak of violence. The Mayors and police officials of more than 30 cities in the Southeast, including all those in which dynamitings or attempted dynamitings have recently occurred, have agreed to attend this conference. The Department of Justice was urged to appear in order to give these city officials the benefit of its extensive experience in crime detection and otherwise to perform its constitutional duty to assist the states, when requested to do so, in the preservation of law and order. Your rejection of this request is totally incomprehensible.

The American Jewish Congress urges you to reverse your present hands-off policy on racist violence. That policy has no justification, constitutional, statutory or political. We call upon you to direct the Department of Justice to investigate the recent outrages to determine whether Federal laws have been violated and to bring to justice any person who has engaged in such a violation. There is no justification for the Department's present policy of inaction. There is ample reason to believe that Federal law may have been violated. That should be enough for initiation of an investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Surely, there is no reason why, in this matter alone, the FBI should follow the stultifying course of not intervening until proof of Federal crime is established.

The threat to "shoot down...in cold blood" the Federal judge who ordered desegregation of the first grades in Nashville public schools is itself sufficient to require Federal action against the so-called "Confederate Underground" wherever it appears. The attacks upon Jewish centers and synagogues and Negro schools are apparently part of a broad conspiracy, operating in a number of states, to prevent citizens from asserting their rights under the Federal Constitution and from complying with a Supreme Court decision. They are an effort to block by intimidation any resort to Federal courts for the vindication of Federal rights.

The Department of Justice has ample basis here for investigating to discover whether Federal law has been violated. It has frequently in the past taken such action without first requiring conclusive evidence that a Federal crime has occurred. Thus, it has moved in quickly in kidnapping cases without any evidence that there has been the kind of movement across state lines that would justify invoking the Lindbergh Anti-Kidnapping Law. In other examples of racist violence, notably in the 1947 lynching of Willie Earle and the bombings in Miami in 1951, the FBI sent in its investigators without awaiting proof of Federal involvement. At the very least, the FBI should follow the precedent it set in 1921 when it started an investigation of the Ku Klux Klan which it continued for more than a year even though no Federal law violations were found.

Perhaps it is not possible to say at this stage that Federal laws have been violated by the outrages described above. Neither is it possible to say with any assurance that they have not. It is the responsibility of the Federal government to find out. That obligation is particularly clear when widespread physical damage has occurred, with grave jeopardy to life and limb, in an avowed effort to frustrate implementation of a United States Supreme Court decision enforcing a basic constitutional right. The people of the United States will not be able to reconcile inaction by the Department of Justice in this grave matter with its reputation for prompt, effective and impartial apprehension of criminals.

TELEGRAM

TO: Attorney General William P. Rogers
Department of Justice
Washington, D.C.

The National Council of Churches has noted reports of the bombings of a Negro school and a Jewish center at Jacksonville and the attempted bombing of Temple Beth-El at Birmingham, Ala. When the recent bombings at Miami, Florida and Nashville, Tenn. are also considered, these events suggest that there may be concerted action involving people in several states to commit violence against religious institutions. We feel that this situation warrants a thorough investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The General Board of the National Council of Churches has repeatedly spoken out against the use of violence to intimidate people and thereby to deny them the use of their basic rights. Among the threatened rights are the freedom of speech, the free exercise of religion, the right of people to peaceably assemble and the equal protection of the law.

We now believe that those responsible for these acts of violence, who are unapprehended, are increasingly extending their vicious activities to include religious institutions in many states. Thus we urge strong action by the Attorney General's office and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to apprehend the perpetrators of these outrageous crimes.

Edwin T. Dahlberg

Council of Churches

THE BOMBINGS IN THE SOUTH

In the last six months, there have been six bombings or attempted bombings of Jewish synagogues and community centers. The list follows:

1. Charlotte, N.C.	Nov. 11,1957	Temple Beth El	6 sticks of dynamite found with defective fuse
2. Gastonia, N.C.	Feb. 9,1958	Temple Emanuel	30 sticks of dynamite with attached half-burned fuse found outside of temple
3. Nashville,Tenn.	March 16,1958	Jewish Community Center	$ 30,000 damage done by dynamite
4. Miami, Fla.	March 16,1958	Temple Beth El	$6,000 damage by dynamite
5. Jacksonville,Fla.	April 28, 1958	Jewish Community Center	$2,000 damage caused by nitroglycerine
6. Birmingham,Ala.	April 28,1958	Temple Beth El	54 sticks of dynamite found with fuse wet by rain

The Howard School for Negroes in Chattanooga, Tenn., was damaged by an explosion (Jan. 19, 1958), and bombs blasted the James Weldon Johnson Junior High School (for Negroes) in Jacksonville a few minutes after the Jewish Center explosion on April 28, 1958.

During this period, the new Hattie Cotton Elementary School (for Negroes) in Nashville was virtually destroyed by dynamite (Sept. 10, 1957).

This series of explosions is not unprecedented in the South. From June to December, 1951, Miami suffered no less than thirteen different dynamitings, the explosives having been placed in front of Jewish community centers and synagogues, a Roman Catholic Church, the local high school, the county court house and a Negro housing project. Two lives were lost in the last blast.

The bombings were obviously not the work of a single individual. The explosive used in the Jacksonville bombings was nitroglycerine which explodes on impact but the two bombings that night occurred almost simultaneously although they were a few miles apart.

No one was ever arrested for any of these crimes, although some local Ku Klux Klan leaders caught redhanded in Charlotte, N.C., carrying dynamite with fuses attached were given heavy jail sentences in March, 1958.

Generally, the dynamiters apparently sought merely to intimidate the community. The bombs were timed to explode when the blasted buildings were unoccupied. Most often, but not always, either the explosives were placed where they would not destroy a building or the quantities used were not sufficient.

Immediately after the Jewish community center explosion in Nashville and Jacksonville, local newspapers received telephone calls from unknown persons who each time identified themselves as "The Confederate Underground" and announced that they had just blown up a "center of integration." The Jacksonville message also warned: "Jews must be driven out of Florida except at Miami Beach. Any Negro who votes in Florida will be killed.....The bombings will continue until segregation is restored everywhere in the South." In Nashville, the dynamiters warned that they would "shoot down in cold blood" Federal Judge William E. Miller who some months before had ordered the local school board to begin desegregating the public schools of Nashville.

The choice of some of the targets for the blasts demonstrates that they were selected merely because they served the Jewish or Negro community. In Jacksonville, Gastonia and Charlotte desegregation is not a local issue and no group in the town is seeking to make it one. In Miami, Temple Beth El, an orthodox synagogue has no social action program and neither its rabbi nor its officers have made any statement on desegregation or indeed on any controversial issue.

The public reaction to the bombings was one of outrage and mortification. In Miami and Nashville large rewards were offered by state and municipal officers and many private individuals spontaneously offered cash contributions to pay for the damaged buildings.

Local police reacted quickly in the cities involved. Guards were placed around other Jewish and Negro property and the police chiefs in the various cities began to exchange information and to plan concerted action.

Requests for intervention by the Federal Bureau of Investigation were made at once, not only by Jewish groups but by government officials. Mayor Hayden Burns of Jacksonville appealed for help from the FBI, a plea that was supported by the six United States Senators from Florida, Tennessee and Alabama. However, U.S. Attorney General William P. Rogers, Jr., insisting that the FBI could only investigate "Federal" crimes, refused to allow the FBI to enter the investigation. Challenging this position in a telegram sent on May 2 to the Attorney General, Dr. Israel Goldstein, president of the American Jewish Congress, inquired how the FBI could be sure that no Federal laws had been violated until an investigation had been made. It also was pointed out that the FBI had not been so fussy in prior years, investigating a bombing assault in Florida solely because a U.S. mail box had been damaged by the blast.

But the Attorney General clung obstinately to his hands-off policy, even rejecting an invitation to assign an officer of the Department of Justice to attend a conference held in Jacksonville on May 3 of the mayors and police chiefs of 28 Southern cities called to coordinate their investigation. Six Southern Senators had appealed to the Department of Justice to accept the invitation. (The American Jewish Congress disclosed this invitation and its rejection in a press release issued on May 2, 1958.)

FBI intervention is imperative at this juncture because a regional investigation of bombings in at least four states cannot be conducted except by a Federal agency. Despite their obvious goodwill and good faith, local police forces in the South obviously lack the resources and experience of the FBI, an agency with a budget of more than $70,000,000 and with 7,000 field agents.

But apart from efficient police investigation, the Southern state governments have a greater responsibility: to reverse their present policy of organizing massive resistance to the nation's desegregation policy affirmed by the Supreme Court in its decision of May 17, 1954. It is this encouragement of lawless resistance to court orders that is ultimately responsible for the assassins who hurl nitroglycerine or plant dynamite. The Nashville Association of Churches put it well in a statement issued after the bombing of the Nashville Jewish Community Center:

> "Although violence may be the work of a few, we believe that many sincere citizens have unwittingly contributed to the attitude which leads to such violence by their refusal to express themselves firmly in favor of law, order and justice. We therefore call upon all religious people in Nashville to work toward the elimination of loose, irresponsible thinking and toward the firm establishment of divine discipline in the community."

The Jewish community in the South, a tiny minority of 265,000 in a population of 40,000,000, has perhaps by this time learned that the strategy of silence, of being neutral while the fight for desegregation rages, simply does not buy protection from bombs. Jewish institutions are dynamited because the twisted KKK mentality responsible for these criminal outrages hates the Jew, the Negro and the Catholic regardless of what he says or does. Jewish communal leaders and rabbis must realize that they have a stake in desegregation and in obtaining prompt compliance to the Supreme Court's mandates. They must seek every constructive opportunity to join with others in defending these mandates. In discouraging lawless resistance to these mandates, they will be upholding law and order and protecting their own security.

Letters to The Times

To Act on Bombings

F. B. I. Intervention Advocated in Southern Attacks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The bombing of the Jacksonville, Fla., Jewish community center on April 28 and the unsuccessful effort that same day to dynamite a Jewish temple in Birmingham, Ala., represent the fifth and sixth of such outrages in the last six months.

On Nov. 11, 1957, six sticks of dynamite sputtered out in front of Temple Beth-El in Charlotte, N. C. On Feb. 9 thirty sticks of dynamite with an attached half-burned fuse were found in front of Temple Emanuel in Gastonia, N. C. On March 16 $30,000 damage was done by dynamite placed outside the school annex of Temple Beth-El in Miami, Fla. That same day the Jewish community center in Nashville, Tenn., was bombed.

Nor were Jewish institutions the only target. In September, 1957, the Hattie Cotton public school in Nashville was bombed, suffering extensive damage, and on April 28 a public school attended exclusively by Negroes was bombed in Jacksonville.

No one has ever been arrested for any of these crimes, although some local Ku Klux Klan leaders in Charlotte, caught redhanded carrying dynamite with fuses and detonator caps attached, were convicted and given heavy jail sentences in March.

Tracking Perpetrators

There is some indication that those responsible for the Nashville Jewish community center bombing hurled the nitroglycerin at the Jacksonville center. Each time local newspapers were telephoned immediately after the explosions. The unknown caller identified himself as "the Confederate Underground" and announced that "we" had just blown up a "center of integration." Although state and local police in these various Southern cities have apparently done all within their power to track down the bombers, there is no indication that they will be successful.

From June to December, 1951, Miami suffered no less than thirteen different dynamitings, the explosives having been placed in front of Jewish community centers and synagogues, a Roman Catholic church, the Miami High School and the Dade County Court House. No one was ever arrested for the attacks.

What is desperately needed at this juncture is the intervention of the F. B. I. It is true that their jurisdiction is limited to the investigation of Federal crimes. But there was a threat in Nashville to assassinate a Federal judge, obviously a Federal crime, and the possibility that the Nashville bombers are also responsible for the attack in Florida should be ground enough to justify an inquiry in every state in which dynamite has been used to set up a curtain of intimidation around the segregation issue.

Federal Crime

The United States Congress in the meantime should quickly enact H. R. 11806, a bill introduced by Representative J. Carlton Loser of Tennessee. The Loser bill would make it a Federal crime to ship explosives in interstate commerce to be used in violation of Federal or state law. The bill also creates a rebuttable presumption that any explosive illegally possessed or used was transported in interstate commerce.

Such a bill would remove any possible doubt about the F. B. I.'s authority to investigate such bombings. Its passage would demonstrate the Federal Government's conviction that it has the responsibility to prevent or punish such bombings.

Dear Will:

I am sorry that problems of timing caused me to default on your request for names in Norfolk. Your letter arrived last Monday, and by the time I returned to the office and saw it you would have already left for Norfolk, if I understood your plans correctly.

I would have suggested that you see Mr. William S. Meachum, of the Norfolk Virginian Pilot, some of the leaders of the Women's Interracial Council, such as Mrs. Louis Jaffe and Mrs. Arnold Strauss, and also one of the members of the Young family which runs the Negro newspaper, The Journal and Guide. But all this is academic, since I suppose you have already been and returned.

Try us again next time and I will try to deliver more promptly.

Dear Will:

At Haskell Lazere's suggestion, I am sending you the enclosed draft copy of a report on violence, intimidation, and reprisals co-sponsored by several of the organizations active in the interagency group. Haskell writes me that he has communicated to you the substance of our discussions at the last meeting, therefore, I will only say that we are in the process of working out the mechanics of publication and release. Once it is out, we hope that the other organizations will be willing to buy a quantity of copies at cost.

Since this is literally our last copy, I am not able to send Haskell one. Perhaps you could forward this one on to him after you and your colleagues have had a chance to look at it.

I neglected to obtain a couple of copies of the fact-finding report which we discussed at the meeting last week. I would suggest that you send one to Will Maslow immediately and also send me one if you have an extra one available. I've already written to Maslow concerning the meeting and the fact-finding publication.

It may interest you to know that we are having a meeting here Monday to discuss the role of the Dade County Council in re the latest bombing. I will take the opportunity at that time to implement some of the suggestions we discussed at our meeting in Atlanta.

I see by the morning paper that arrests have been made, and I hope that the police can prove the guilt of those picked up.

New York 28, New York

Dear Will:

Thanks for your letter of October 29 on the fact-finding study, and the interesting chart you have prepared. I also have the copy of your letter to Clyde Sellers concerning the Montgomery bombings.

To comment first on the latter, the enclosed clip from the New York Times tells of the acquittal of the two men charged in the Montgomery bombings. This left standing a second charge of dynamiting against Britt, but on November 26, 1957, the state dropped this and charges against two other men accused of bombing a taxi stand and the Rev. Ralph Abernathy's home. At the same time, officials dropped the boycott indictments against 89 Negroes and appealed for restoration of racial harmony.

As for the alleged confessions of Britt and Livingston (to which Pearson evidently referred), the defense accused city police of using "coercion, intimidation and brutality" and maintained that the defendants did not make the statements voluntarily. The confessions were not introduced as signed documents, but through a police officer's testimony.

Regarding the other questions you raise, numbered correspondingly:

(1) The other two Negro churches damaged by bombs (listed under Alabama 5) were the Bell Street Baptist Church and the Mount Olive Church.

(3) The A.P., I.N.S., Atlanta Daily World, Christian Science Monitor, and New York Times all agree on the January 10, 1957 date for the Montgomery bombings and on other essential details. We don't have the Birmingham World story, so can't comment on the discrepancies to which you refer; but I should think it's the Birmingham World that is in error.

(4) The Beaumont, Texas, bombings were taken from the March, 1957, Southern School News, which would indicate they had occurred a month or so earlier, but it seems unlikely they would date back to November. Regarding the bombing of the place of business of a state senator, you will have noted that our item reports the bombing of a truck owned by State Senator Kilpatrick. This, also, is from SSN. The only other clipping available here, is one of January 30, 1957, from the Atlanta Daily World, which tells of the three bombings, apparently the previous day, in Beaumont. It refers to the bombing of the Kilpatrick flash storage company, along with the other two listed by SSN. However, we used the SSN story, both because the report was based on news in the general press entirely, and since it was assumed that the later SSN item was more likely to be correct because of the additional time for checking--hence, the senator's car rather than the business firm. It seems likely that the November 4 date in the transcript was incorrect.

(5) Edward Cline, 44, the man given two to 10 year prison sentence in the Clinton High bomb conspiracy. According to an INS story in the Atlanta Daily World of February 14, 1958, his attorney said he would appeal but we do not find any follow-up clippings.

(6) No conviction of the five KKK members charged in the Gaffney bombing of the Sanders home. Two were acquitted of charges of assault with intent to kill, two were no-billed earlier by the Cherokee County grand jury, and the fifth was killed accidentally when his car fell off a jack and crushed him.

I wish I could give you a publication date for the study. The latest publication plan (by the National Council of Churches) has just collapsed, and I must now re-poll the steering committee on how we are to proceed. As soon as I know definitely, I will write you again.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Dear Harold:

I have prepared the enclosed chart based upon your "Report on Violence, Intimations and Reprisals" as well as on material from the ADL and our own files.

You will notice several corrections of your dates and incidents which you might want to call to the attention of your editor of this material. There are also some disturbing gaps in your material which ought to be closed, for example, what happened to the five KKK members charged in December, 1957 with responsibility for the Sanders bombing in Gaffney, South Carolina.

Can you estimate when your document will be ready for release? It is important that we have it available when the hearings on the anti-dynamite bills begin in Congress next January.

Sincerely,

P.S. Perhaps it would be useful if I list all of my questions:

1) Can you name the two unidentified Negro churches listed under Alabama 5.
2) Drew Pearson reported on October 27 that the police in Montgomery arrested those guilty of the bombings and obtained written confessions from them. Do you know anything about this?
3) The Birmingham World of December 8, 1957 has a round-up story about the bombings, giving different details and different dates from your report.

Hon. Clyde Sellers
Commissioner of Public Safety
Montgomery, Ala.

My dear Commissioner:

Drew Pearson, in his column of October 27, from Atlanta, commends you highly for your "forthright and efficient" work in apprehending those guilty of the bombings of churches in your city and obtaining written confession from them.

There has been no report of these arrests or confessions in the New York papers, or at any rate I have not seen them. I would appreciate it therefore if you could give me whatever information is a matter of public orcord, or if it is more convenient for you, to send me clippings of the convictions and confessions.

We will be grateful for your cooperation in this matter.

Very truly yours,

Will Maslow

Dear Harold:

I have just gone through the round up of intimidation, reprisals and violence since January, 1955 which was prepared by the Southern interagency group. The material will be exceedingly useful for many purposes especially in the fight for legislation next January. I hope it can be produced as cheaply as possible so that the material can be widely distributed. You should also seek to have it placed into the Congressional Record by some friendly Senator, thus making it available to a national audience.

My only comment about the format is that you should perhaps summarize the count under each item in the introductory chapter. For example, I counted some 34 bombings reported. This figure should be in a summary.

Poor Haskell will have to wait until the document is printed because we need it daily up here.

Sincerely,

Will

Dear Will:

Thanks for your two most recent letters. This is in reply to both.

I have heard of the Eaton book but haven't read it; prompted by your recommendation, I'll make a special effort to do so. Eaton is a historian. The latest address we have found for him is 2995 Tate's Creek Road, Route 67, Lexington, Kentucky. This suggests that he may be at the University of Kentucky.

The Mississippi Valley Historical Review is published by the Mississippi Valley Historical Association, 1500 "R" Street, Lincoln 8, Nebraska. Perhaps they can supply a copy of the December 1942 issue.

We are aware of the paucity of complaints to the Commission on Civil Rights and are doing what we can to spread the word. We are currently doing some field studies of voter registration practices in the Black Belt which may result in some complaints. The problem, as you know, is finding persons with first-hand knowledge who can stand the gaff.

All the best.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

I am reading a fascinating book first published in ~~1950~~ 1940 by Clement Eaton, entitled "Freedom of Thought in the Old South." If you have not read it, I urge you to, because of the frightening similarity between then and now. Have you heard of this man Eaton and do you know whether he can be located now?

The book is published by Peter Smith. Incidentally, he cites an article that he himself has written on Southern mob violence in the December 1942 issue of the Mississippi Valley Historical Review. Do you know where that is published and how I can get a copy?

Dear Harold:

I met yesterday with two representatives of the Commission on Civil Rights. They are worried about the small number of complaints the Commission has received and are fearful of an attack upon them because of this paucity.

I remember hearing Mrs. Tilly say that her churchwomen were going to watch polling places. Are they in a position to file complaints? You understand that the complainant does not himself have to be a person who was aggrieved.

Best regards.

Mr. Will Maslow, Director

Dear Will:

I've delayed a week in answering your recent letter, pending return to the office of the staff member who is best acquainted with Norfolk. I did, however, send the copies of "Intimidation, Reprisal, and Violence," which should have reached you by now. They are supplied with our compliments.

The attitude survey, as you briefly describe it, sounds like an interesting and useful project. Without knowing more about the purpose of the investigation and the proposed use of the findings, I can't make any fundamental judgment about the choice of cities. But certainly Norfolk and Montgomery, in different ways, have much to commend them.

Montgomery, of course, represents an inflamed situation where racial tension has been accompanied by overt appeals to anti-Semitism; I gather that feelings of insecurity and anxiety in the Jewish community are accordingly greater there than in most other Southern cities.

Norfolk has had a milder racial experience, but anti-semitic lieterature has apparently had fairly wide circulation there and Jewish leaders have had to wrestle with the question of their community roles in a period of contested social change.

The only question in my mind is whether there would be virtue in including, for purposes of comparison, a Southern city which has not experienced severe racial tensions and where the sense of threat in the Jewish community is less marked. Perhaps one of the major cities in Texas or in North Carolina would qualify.

In any case, I am enclosing a short list of names for both Norfolk and Montgomery, with the thought that these and other contacts would direct Dr. Fiskman to as many more interviewees as he might need. At the risk of crudity, I am indicating the race of each individual as a possible convenience to the interviewer.

If we can be of any further help, call on me.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming
Executive Director

Mr. Harold C. Fleming

Dear Harold:

Judge Justine Polier has been interested for some time in the attitudes of rank and file Southern Jews on the problems of integration. She has been able to obtain some funds from a foundation for a preliminary experimental project which would involve a field trip in two Southern cities by qualified social psychologists. Dr. Joshua Fishman of the Institute of Human Relations of the University of Pennsylvania has agreed to undertake the project. An advisory committee supervising the project felt that the two best cities for such a purpose were Norfolk, Virginia and Montgomery, Alabama. Dr. Fishman plans to visit these cities this summer if the appropriate introductions can be arranged.

I should like to ask you, first, whether you agree on the choice of cities. Secondly, can you give us the names of knowledgeable persons in each of these two cities whom Dr. Fishman could meet and who in turn could introduce him to other persons in the community?

Needless to say, Dr. Fishman wants to meet not only Jews but white and Negro Christians as well.

Finally, the advisory committee believed that it would be well not to publicize the project although, of course, the persons whom Dr. Fishman should meet should understand the purpose of his visit.

Any help you can give us will be appreciated.

A MODEL STATE HUMAN RELATIONS COMMISSION BILL

TITLE

STATE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RELATIONS

1.0. Policy

In the State of with its great population consisting of large numbers of people of every race, color, religion, national origin and ancestry, there is no greater danger to the health, morals, safety and welfare of the state and its inhabitants than the existence of groups prejudiced against one another and antagonistic to each other because of differences of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry.

DIGEST OF MODEL STATE HUMAN RELATIONS COMMISSION BILL

1. Introduction

You are no doubt familiar with the operation of state and municipal statutory commissions empowered to take action against discrimination in employment, education, public accommodations and the like. In recent years a new type of commission has been developed which has no regulatory functions but which attacks the underlying problems of racial and religious prejudice and intergroup hostility. These commissions, particularly those in Wisconsin and Minnesota, have been successful in dealing with problems no FEP commission is authorized to handle. In response to a number of requests we have drafted a model bill for the establishment of such a commission, a copy of which is enclosed.

2. Powers and Duties

The bill creates a commission consisting of fifteen members including a chairman, appointed by the governor, to be broadly representative of the social, economic and cultural interests of the state. Members serve without compensation.

The Commission would be empowered to receive and investigate (and initiate its own investigations of) complaints of group hostility, tension and prejudice and would also be authorized to investigate discrimination against individuals and groups, both by private persons or organizations and by state officials or agencies.

It could hold public and private hearings at which it could compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of evidence and take testimony under oath. It would be authorized to use its efforts to bring about compliance with its recommendations. It might issue general publications and reports of investigations and research and would be empowered to recommend to the governor and state legislature such legislation as would aid in limiting prejudice or discrimination.

The Commission would function through an executive director and a civil service staff. The services of other departments in the state government are also to be made available.

3. Program

As part of its overall program, the Commission would collect information on local conditions, the existence of tensions, the extent of discrimination and on problems arising from population and neighborhood changes. It would engage in "trouble-shooting" or "tension control" by watching for antagonisms and by taking remedial action to remove the causes of tension. It would have an educational program designed to disseminate information, promote good will and influence attitudes. It would encourage citizen participation in the pressing problems of intergroup relations. Finally, it is directed in cooperation with other governmental agencies to develop educational and training programs for its employees.

The Commission's decisions and recommendations would be advisory and not binding on anyone. It would be authorized to cooperate with private civic organizations and to create advisory committees of private citizens.

FROM: Don J. Hager

In December, 1954, the New York City Board of Education stated ". . . racially homogeneous public schools are educationally unsound." In the effort to achieve optimum integration in the public schools of New York City, the Board created a Commission on Integration. This Commission and its various subcommissions (Zoning, Teachers Assignments and Personnel, Physical Plant and Maintenance, Educational Standards and Curriculum, Guidance, Educational Stimulation, and Community Relations and Information) were to study and report upon plans to achieve more racially balanced schools.

The attached report prepared by the subcommission on Zoning establishes ". . . the objective of racial integration as a cardinal principle of zoning." It contains a series of carefully considered proposals for achieving integration in elementary, junior and senior high schools. It recommends the development of a comprehensive zoning plan for integration to be administered by a Central Zoning Unit, thus removing the power to set school district lines from local assistant superintendents and placing it in the hands of a central planning authority.

It is our view that this report will prove to be a useful guide to integration in other large urban centers. We will endeavor to send you other materials, from time to time, concerning the process of integration in the public schools of New York City.

REPORT OF THE SUB-COMMISSION ON ZONING

GENERAL COMMENT

The sub-commission on Zoning of the Board of Education's Commission on Integration has given careful and considered attention to the conditions that exist in New York City that tend to separate children of different ethnic origins and proposes a plan to achieve more racially balanced schools.

New York City's public elementary and junior high schools are neighborhood schools and the school populations, therefore, reflect the ethnic composition of the school district. This means that children within a given composition of the community area determined by school officials attend the school in that area. This is the basic cause for the condition whereby many of our schools have homogeneous populations, commonly called de facto segregation.

The Supreme Court decision of May, 1954 had the effect of declaring unconstitutional those state or local laws which mandate school segregation. In this sense it has no application in New York City since the State of New York has for many years prohibited by law such school segregation. In writing its decision, the Supreme Court established the premise upon which it based that decision:

> "We come then to the question presented: Does segregation of children in public schools soley on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other 'tangible' factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities? We believe that it does.
> ". . . . To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone . . ."

This conclusion would appear valid no matter how the segregation comes about, if it is solely on basis of race.

Although the law governing New York City public institutions forbids all forms of discrimination, there are factors that tend to perpetuate homogeneous schools and to impede efforts toward integration in our schools. Such factors include our housing pattern, our long tradition of the concept of the neighborhood school, community attitudes, misinformation, zoning criteria which did not emphasize more racially balanced schools, pressures on school officials to violate district boundaries and falsifications of address by parents to prevent their children from attending schools with Negro and Puerto Rican children.

Taking all of the above facts into consideration, the sub-commission on Zoning made its study with the awareness that zoning is one of the key points in the efforts of the Board of Education".... to devise and put into operation a plan which will prevent the further development of such schools (racially homogeneous) and would integrate the existing ones as quickly as practicable."*

The sub-commission's first task was to examine present major zoning criteria which are the determinants of zone lines: distance from home to school, maximum utilization of school space, transportation, topographical barriers and continuity of instruction.

The Board of Education, in affirming the spirit of the Supreme Court decision, stated "....that racially homogeneous public schools are educationally undesirable."* In the light of this, it is clearly necessary to re-evaluate the neighborhood-school concept and the major zoning criteria which, in addition to integration, are the determinants of zone lines. These are:

*Quotation from policy statement of the Board of Education - December, 1954.

1. Distance from home to school--This means that the proximity of the schools to the homes of the children who attend it is a major consideration in deciding on the boundary lines. This is particularly true of the elementary schools. A half-mile is considered beyond walking distance for pupils in the kindergarten through second grade, a mile for pupils in the third through the eighth grade.
2. Maximum utilization of school space -- in the face of mounting enrollments, it is necessary to adjust zone lines to make the most efficient use of existing school facilities.
3. Transportation -- Where it is necessary for children to use public transportation, the convenience and accessibility of such transportation has been a factor in setting zone lines. In instances where children are assigned to schools beyond the distance limits mentioned in Item 1, transportation by various means, including special bus, is provided.
4. Topographical barriers -- Lakes, rivers, canals, railroads, street crossings, bridges, parks, highways and other natural and man-made obstacles are factors which often have an intruding influence with respect to school zoning.
5. Continuity of instruction -- It is an objective to avoid shifting the same pupils several times because of adjustments in school boundaries.

The clear and positive integration policy, as stated by the Board of Education, means that all of the existing zoning criteria must now be reviewed at the highest level in the light of their effect on school integration.

The local Assistant Superintendent is the school official to whom is assigned the task of determining the boundary lines for the elementary schools and the feeder pattern for the junior high schools in his districts. It is Board of Education policy that the local Assistant Superintendent consult with parent groups before establishing the zone lines in his districts.

In its examination, the sub-commission on Zoning found the need for a clear, positive zoning policy to promote racially balanced schools.

The formulation of a comprehensive zoning plan (explained in Recommendation II) incorporating the philosophies, policies and procedures to accomplish integration to the extent possible in the city schools; securing necessary information on residential patterns, population trends, etc.; the evaluation of future zoning practices as they affect integration; are functions in part beyond the scope of a local Assistant Superintendent.

There may be instances where integration can be achieved, while the usual consideration is given to the zoning factors mentioned above. In other cases, it may be necessary to modify the application of these criteria in order to attain maximum integration. The advantages to the children to be gained from the consideration of these criteria must be weighed against the advantages to be gained from education in integrated classrooms.

Since these factors have very little effect on students of senior high school age, it would seem possible to obtain a reasonable racial balance in the larger number of academic and vocational high schools in our system. Suggestions for methods to change the percentages of the various racial groups entering high school are beyond the purview of this sub-commission. However, efforts should be made to distribute this total population so as to have each such high school population reasonably reflect the ethnic make-up of the over-all high school population and so as to avoid having any such high school composed sole ly of one ethnic group. Specialized high schools present other complications since special examinations are used as part of the basis for admission. Present admission requirements should be studied with a view to determining a method to identify potentially able students who have been environmentally disadvantaged.* The pilot project in identification, guidance and stimulation of students now being conducted at Junior High School 43, Manhattan, as the result of a recommendation of the sub-commission on Guidance, may provide valuable information for this purpose.

At the junior high school level, the aforementioned zoning criteria must be taken into consideration to a greater extent than the high schools. However, there is considerably more flexibility than in the case of elementary schools. By a careful selection of feeder schools and/or establishment of zone lines, it is possible to improve the racial balance in junior high schools, both in fringe areas and those not too remote from fringe areas.

At the elementary school level, the boundary lines of schools located in or sufficiently close to fringe areas can be drawn to achieve reasonable balance. However, for schools where this method is not possible, there are other methods

* In the integration of high schools, a study should be made of the program adjustments that may be necessary for integration.

such as the following which have been brought to the attention of the sub-commission. These are listed with the understanding that the circumstances for each particular school must be carefully examined to determine which, if any, of these methods can be applied successfully in the furtherance of integration. Care must also be exercised that none of these methods is used to the detriment of integration.

1. Permissive zoning (that is, permission to attend a school other than that to which a child is assigned) can be used to provide children in a school with homogeneous population the opportunity to attend an integrated school.
2. Selective use of bus transportation (for example, where an under-utilized school is within a reasonable distance by bus of a school with homogeneous population, children may be transferred from the latter school to the under-utilized one).
3. Change of organization of school (such as converting junior high to elementary school) -- This method can be used to help reduce the number of years a child spends in a homogeneous setting.

Every effort must be exercised to maintain high educational standards in integrated schools to stimulate students and parents and school staff. Recommendations in this regard of the sub-commission on Educational Standards and that on Physical Plant and Maintenance are noted.

From these methods and others which may be devised by the professional staff, the local Assistant Superintendent and the Central Zoning Unit proposed in our recommendations may select those which can be applied in each instance.

The above examination of the problem at the various school levels and the formal recommendations which follow are designed to help the Board of Education mitigate the effects of the segregated residence pattern, a condition which affects the public schools but with which the Board cannot deal directly.

However, it must be remembered that this pattern is caused in part by attitudes of prejudice, indifference and misunderstanding which must be corrected eventually if integration is to be complete. Education in a democratic setting has meaning as preparation for living in a democratic setting. The steps taken in the zoning program must be accompanied by a community relations program that engenders support for integration on the part of parents of all groups. Although valuable time and effort should not be expended counteracting evasive actions of confused, insecure or misguided parents, they must be helped to understand the change which is taking place in their communities and the constructive ways in which to meet this change. Intelligent guidance can ease their rigidity and provide them with greater security. This places a serious responsibility on the agencies that will be charged with the implementation of the zoning program. They must, by the exercise of good judgment, choose the path that assures constant progress and thus final success in achieving the Board of Education objectives.

In order to further the objective of the Board of Education to establish integrated schools to the extent possible, the sub-commission on Zoning recommends:

I. That the Board of Education establish the objective of racial integration as a cardinal principle of zoning. In so doing, all members of the professional staff who do now, or will in the future, have any part in the assignment of children to, or the location of regular schools, special schools and special classes, must be made conscious of this principle. They must seize each opportunity to implement it.

II. That a comprehensive plan be formulated by the Superintendent of Schools and, in general, be administered by a Central Zoning Unit. The comprehensive zoning plan should:

1. Provide guide posts for the Assistant Superintendent to help him determine the proper weight to be given to the principle of securing racially balanced schools as well as other principles of zoning, mentioned heretofore, as he prepares zoning proposals for the schools of his districts for submission to the Central Zoning Unit.
2. Devise a set of criteria by which the Central Zoning Unit can determine the extent to which each local zoning plan fits into the comprehensive plan.
3. Establish priorities for groups of schools and provide a timetable for the accomplishment of integration in the schools.
4. Describe procedures which the Central Zoning Unit and the Assistant Superintendent can use in reaching objectives such as redrawing boundary lines, placement of special classes and courses, selective use of bus transportation, rearrangement of feeder patterns and permissive zoning to promote integration only. The comprehensive plan should be presented by the Superintendent of Schools to the Board of Education in sufficient time to permit the plan to be put into operation in September, 1957.

III. That an Advisory Council on Zoning be organized on a city-wide basis, composed of representatives of city departments and agencies such as the City Planning Commission, Housing Aurhority, Traffic Department, Commission on Intergroup Relations, etc., for the following purposes:

1. Provide for the mutual interchange of information to assist in composing racially balanced schools and communities.
2. Coordinate present plans of these departments and agencies to assist in composing racially balanced schools and communities.
3. Develop comprehensive, long-term plans for the purpose of furthering the establishment of more racially balanced schools and communities.
4. Provide for the participation of interested civic groups in devising plans for racially balanced schools and communities. (This may be on a formal basis by way of a committee of representatives of these groups or other means deemed most feasible.)
5. Provide advice and information to all member departments and agencies for the purpose of furthering the establishment of more racially balanced schools and communities.

It is further recommended that, upon agreement by the Board that such a council be organized and that the Board of Education be a member of this council, the Liaison sub-commission of the Commission on Integration be requested to suggest more specifically the composition and functions of such a council.

IV. That a Central Zoning Unit be established by the Superintendent of Schools for the purpose of preparing and coordinating city-wide zoning plans in order to achieve maximum integration in the public schools. This unit would perform the following functions:

1. Compare the zoning proposals of each Assistant Superintendent before the beginning of each school year with the comprehensive plan for zoning and consult with the Assistant Superintendent concerning such changes as are indicated. The Central Zoning Unit will then prepare for the Superintendent of Schools the zoning plans for the districts.
2. Evaluate the efficiency of the comprehensive plan in securing more racially balanced schools and recommend to the Superintendent of Schools for presentation to the Board of Education changes to make the comprehensive plan more effective.
3. Report periodically to the Superintendent of Schools so that he may advise the Board of Education on the effectiveness of zoning policies and procedures and recommend changes for improvement.
4. Hear appeals from the parent and community groups on zoning proposals and zoning changes by an Assistant Superintendent and make recommendations to the Superintendent of Schools for his guidance in making decisions on appeals.
5. Provide a means whereby civic groups may present their suggestions regarding over-all zoning plans.
6. Establish and maintain comprehensive city-wide zoning maps showing the following: school district boundaries and patterns of feeder schools, the racial and ethnic composition of the school population (a sufficiently good estimate of this can be obtained without recourse to direct questioning of children or parents), school utilization, site selection and planned districting for new schools, topographical characteristics and planned capital improvements having an impact on school utilization. This unit would maintain records of the composition of the school population by age and residence.

7. Devise administrative procedures to assist Assistant Superintendents and principals in combatting falsifications of address and other evasions of the proper school zones.

8. Provide for the use of the Advisory Council the information necessary to its deliberations in regard to school matters.

9. Provide information to the Assistant Superintendent to aid him in the formulation of his zoning proposals.

10. Coordinate zoning plans with the unit charged with the responsibility of making site recommendations.

V. That the following zoning duties be assigned by the Superintendent of Schools to the Assistant Superintendents:

1. Each Assistant Superintendent, after consultation with parent and community groups, and with the advice of the Central Zoning Unit, will prepare zoning proposals for the schools in his districts for the following year. These proposals will be prepared in accordance with the comprehensive plan for integration and submitted to the Central Zoning Unit at the time specified by that Unit.

2. During the school year, changes in the adopted zoning plan are to be made by the Assistant Superintendent if, in his judgment, a change in the determinants of his plan warrants such adjustment, and if, in his judgment, the changes do not conflict with the comprehensive plan or the program of integration and require no consideration by the Central Zoning Unit. However, any such change should be reported immediately to the Central Zoning Unit for incorporation in its records and on its maps.

3. The Assistant Superintendent should make public, within his districts, his proposals on zoning and invite constructive comment and suggestions by parent and community groups involved in the changes.

4. The Assistant Superintendent should take appropriate steps to develop within his districts an understanding of and positive attitudes towards more racially balanced schools as part of a good intergroup relations program.

5. The Assistant Superintendent should present to the Superintendent of Schools through the Central Zoning Unit suggestions for more effective action through zoning to achieve more racially balanced schools.

VI. That a broad community relations program be developed. Such a program would be in addition to the efforts of each Assistant Superintendent in this regard. It should be designed to obtain the active assistance of the community in securing and maintaining heterogeneous school populations. This is crucial if this program of integration in the schools is to take full effect in other areas of community life. We invite the attention of the Community Relations sub-commission to this item.

Some of these recommendations may require additional budget funds; however, there are many recommendations which can be implemented without extra funds. This sub-commission believes that the objectives to be gained definitely justify the expenditure required.

Specific Problems

The sub-commission invited three community groups who had expressed grievances with regard to zoning. It heard these protests in the belief that this action would be helpful in developing a set of zoning principles and a machinery for implementing them. In conducting these hearings, the sub-commission did not assume that it had aministrative jurisdictions or that its function included adjudication of individual complaints. This conclusion was supported by the Executive Committee of the Commission and by the Commission itself. At that time, the opinion was expressed that no sub-commission should be involved in the operations and techniques that rightfully belong to the professional staff. The summary of these hearings is appended at the end of this report.

Appendix

Hearing No. 1: Presentation by the Brooklyn Branch NAACP: Junior High School 258 is a new school in Brooklyn that is an all Negro School. Near it, under construction, is J.H.S. 61, Brooklyn, which the Board of Education promises will be an integrated school. The plaintiff charges that " a serious error of judgment was made in the location of J.H.S. 258" and asks that J.H.S. 258 be re-organized to make it an integrated school.

Hearing No. 2: Presentation by the Parents' Association of Public School 93, Manhattan: The plaintiff was concerned over the population trend which is in the direction of more Negro and Puerto Rican children in P.S. 93 than in P.S. 75 and P.S. 166, Manhattan, neighboring schools. It was suggested that integration could be furthered by transferring the I.G.C. classes in P.S. 75 to P.S. 93 and by making the school more attractive physically.*

Hearing No. 3: Presentation by the Forest Houses Neighborhood Committee: Two high schools in The Bronx, Grace Dodge Vocational H.S. and Jane Addams Vocational H.S., offer courses in Beauty Culture. Jane Addamss' courses are predominantly filled with Negroes. Grace Dodge's courses are taken mostly by whites. It was suggested that all beauty culture courses be given at Jane Addams and that all Bronx students desiring such courses be restricted to the Bronx school.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

I am herewith enclosing three copies of a newspaper story and editorial which appeared in the Birmingham Post Herald recently.

I, personally, believe that these two items are among the most significant to appear in the Southern Press in quite some time in terms of their use in promoting the concept of "maintaining law and order" in the face of rising racial tension and unrest.

This appears to be one of the first admissions on the part of Southern Industrial Leadership, as well as a Newspaper Editor, that effects of violence regarding racial problems has affected, and will continue to affect, the growth of southern industrial development. I know of the Council's great interest in developing a program in this area, and I feel that these two items will be of value to you.

I shall be out of town on a field trip during the next few days, but upon my return, would like an opportunity to meet with you and discuss the implications of the use of this and similar material in the South.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

Samuel Lubin

Dear Mr. Lubin:

Thanks for your letter of February 19th, enclosing copies of the story and editorial in the Birmingham Post Herald. This is unquestionably a promising beginning on the assumption of responsibility by the economic leadership of the South.

I am about to leave for Washington and New York, where I will see Ed Lukas and possibly many other friends at AJC. I will be gone for about ten days, but as soon as I am back I want to get together with you.

Best regards.

Dear Ted:

Harold Fleming was talking with Dave Freeman and Adam Yarmolinsky of the Fund for the Republic the other day and they had not seen the very excellent memo done by Julius Cohen on tax exemption which appeared in the 1956 report of the NAIRO Commission on Civil Rights. Would you, therefore, please send to each of them a marked copy of the report?

Best personal regards.

Dear Miss Polier:

I have marked my appointment calendar for May 7th with the following notation, "Women's Division, American Jewish Congress, Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D.C." I shall be very pleased to speak to the Women's Division on the challenge of integration as it affects the education of our children. Thank you for the kind words about my work in this field. I shall be in correspondence with you later with some suggested topics which I would like to cover in this speech.

I hate to mention this, but we are running short of funds in our travel budget and it will be necessary for my expenses to be covered.

Please let me hear from you.

Dear Mr. Schatz:

I am looking forward to addressing a session of the National Convention of the Women's Division of the American Jewish Congress on Tuesday evening, May 7th.

I would appreciate it if you would make a reservation for a single room with shower at the Shoreham Hotel, or another close by if all the reservations are gone, for the night of May 7th. I will arrange my own transportation and send you an expense account afterward. I use an air travel card and this is the simplest way of making arrangements. I want to thank you for your generosity in assuming the burden of my travel expenses.

One additional bit of information that would be helpful to me is the format of the evening program, e.g., length of speech and whether or not a question and answer or discussion period follows.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Dear Mr. Schatz:

I have received your letter of April 4 with further information about my participation in the May 7 meeting of the Women's Division of the American Jewish Congress. I have received several communiques from various members of the Women's Division, and believe I now have a sufficient grasp of what is expected of me at this session.

You asked if there is anything further you can do to assist me with hotel reservations and the like. I wrote you on March 29 and said I would appreciate it if you could make a reservation for a single room with shower at the Shoreham Hotel or another one close by if the Shoreham reservations were all gone for the night of May 7. I use an air travel card, and will arrange my own transportation and AJC can reimburse SRC at a later date. I want to thank you for your generosity in assuming the burden of my travel expenses.

Mrs. Polier called on Friday and asked for a biography and a glossy print for publicity purposes. I got those off Air Mail Special Delivery Friday morning. I note that you ask in the last paragraph of your letter of April 4 for several biographies and glossy prints. I will get these off to you this afternoon or, better yet, will enclose them with this letter.

I look forward to being with you on May 7th. Warm regards.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Enclosed is a draft of a study manual on the problems of integration in public education, recently prepared by the American Jewish Congress. This has been prepared as a guide for adult discussion groups and contains basic information on various aspects of the problem of integration in the North as well as in the South, plus questions for stimulating group discussion.

While the storm center of struggle concerning desegregation and integration has been in the South, the attempts at achieving integration in the North have exposed the hidden conflicts of many Northerners as well, who approve equality in theory but retain many social and emotional conflicts concerning equality in practice. We feel, therefore, that it is extremely important that community organizations begin a more concentrated program designed to bring into public discussion the problems of intergroup tension, the causes of discrimination and prejudice and the need for the North as well as the South to bridge the gap between belief and behavior.

We have prepared this manual as part of a community education program on this subject, not only for chapters in the AJCongress but for all community groups interested in encouraging public discussion of these problems. Because of your special knowledge and interest in public education, we are sending you a draft copy of this manual and would appreciate any comments or suggestions you may have--before we go to print.

Sincerely yours,

Don Hager

Subject: Moral and Spiritual Values Programs

At the request of the National Community Relations Advisory Council, the American Jewish Congress is conducting a survey of the various "moral and spiritual values" programs now being used or proposed for use in the public schools throughout the country.

We ask your cooperation in obtaining the following material and information:

1. Printed or mimeographed copies of moral and spiritual values statements and program guides issued by the State Department of Education or local Boards of Education. Please include the date on which the program was instituted and specify whether it is still in existence.

2. Reports on the reactions of the community (both the Jewish community and other groups) to the moral and spiritual values programs.

3. Reports on any incidents of sectarian intrusion or indoctrination which resulted from the introduction of moral and spiritual values programs.

4. An estimation of how moral and spiritual values programs in your community worked in general; whether the program was a success, a failure, etc.

We are interested most in obtaining the printed or mimeographed copies of official statements and programs proposed or already in use. Since compiling the information requested in sections 2, 3 and 4 above may take some time, please send the printed programs and statements referred to in section 1 above as soon as available and the other material as it is gathered.

Please mail the materials directly to me at our National Office, 15 East 84th Street, New York 28, N.Y.

You may perhaps be interested in the enclosed report of a panel discussion conducted recently by the American Association for the United Nations on the question "Should the United States Ratify International Conventions?" Since the conference, held last March, our government has apparently revised its policy of five-years standing and is now prepared to vote favorable for a convention against forced labor at the annual conference of the International Labor Organization which opens June 5, 1957.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

PEOPLES SECTION

(Originated by Carlyle Morgan of the Christian Science Monitor in 1947)

BULLETIN

April, 1957

Remember your opinion is important! Please send us your comments before May 15th.

MAJOR ISSUES BEFORE THE UNITED NATIONS: WHAT IS THE UNITED STATES RESPONSIBILITY?

The annual Conference of National Organizations called by the American Association for the United Nations met in Washington, D. C. March 3-5, 1957. Some ninety organizations were represented at the Conference, which considered five major issues before the United Nations and the responsibility of the United States in respect to them: The New Challenge to the General Assembly; New Dimensions for Economic Development; Possibilities for Disarmament; To Promote Justice for the Individual — Should the United States Ratify International Conventions?; and A Positive Solution for the Middle East.

Findings of each Section Meeting were presented to the final plenary session of the Conference. We wish we could present all of them, but space limits us to presenting the findings on three of these major issues: The New Challenge to the General Assembly; New Dimensions for Economic Development; and To Promote Justice for the Individual — Should the United States Ratify International Conventions?

In reading and discussing the findings of the Section Meetings given below, we suggest that members keep in mind the following questions:

How effective do you think the UN has been in solving these major issues?

What might the UN do in the future?

How would you assess the role of the United States?

What should the US position be in the future?

What might individuals and organizations do?

How closely do you think these findings reflect opinion in your community?

The New Challenge to the General Assembly

The Section on "The New Challenge to the General Assembly" met under the chairmanship of Arthur N. Holcombe, Chairman, Commission to Study the Organization of Peace. Speakers were Harding Bancroft, former U. S. Representative, UN Collective Measures Committee, and Frank P. Graham. Panel members were Adrian S. Fisher, former Legal Adviser, Department of State, and William R. Frye, UN Correspondent, Christian Science Monitor. Mrs. Marion McVitty, United World Federalists, served as rapporteur. We present below Mrs. McVitty's report.

Professor Holcombe, as Chairman, gave focus to the question of the New Challenge to the General Assembly at the opening of the session in two brief statements. He pointed out that the very success of the UN Assembly in dealing with issues on which the Security Council failed has created the new challenge and new problems. Likewise, Professor Holcombe noted that success in achieving greater universality of membership in the UN, which we all desired, has created the challenge and problems connected with the new members.

Dr. Frank Graham, in his address, inspired the group with his conception of the broad principles that must inspirit the UN and the world's peoples, and which must underlie United States leadership.

The moral foundations of the UN, he pointed out, are in the hearts and minds of people everywhere. The atomic age, Dr. Graham said, has made the world fatefully interdependent. The atomic age makes the UN an essential organization. Representation of the world's two and one-half billion people, a majority of whom are non-white, makes the General Assembly the most essential organ of the UN.

Dr. Graham warned that the fuses attached to an atomic explosion are: exploitation, colonialism, racism, the arms race, and absolute national sovereignty. United States leadership in the world forum must be based on demonstrating the right principles in this country. This country must help to organize the instruments of freedom, justice and peace; and to help apply UN Charter principles with equal justice for all, friend and foe alike. The new challenge to the UN, Dr. Graham concludes, is also a new challenge to the United States.

Mr. Harding Bancroft gave a careful analysis of the major elements in the current UN situation. He pointed out that the United Nations has not developed according to plan, but it is his belief that the evolutionary process now going on is a suitable means for adapting the UN to present needs.

In his view, no Charter amendments are required, since adequate methods for peaceful settlement of disputes are available if the nations will use them; and although the UN has been weakest in taking enforcement measures, the Charter provides all the necessary provisions for making enforcement effective.

Mr. Bancroft stated that Korea and the Mid-East crisis have created a rather general receptivity to the taking of collective enforcement action. Advantage of this receptivity should be taken, he believed, to insure that the UN will have a Peace Force in being. Mr. Bancroft then outlined his conception of how such a force should be created. The Assembly should set up a special body to study the question. It should negotiate the size and composition of the force, its training, cost and functions. A permanent nucleus force might be made up of small national units and a unit of volunteers individually recruited. Such a nucleus could be appropriately expanded to meet specific needs for its services. The Assembly, Mr. Bancroft thought, would need to set up a smaller executive group to administer the force and exercise great wisdom in its use.

Mr. Bancroft was not fearful of the new Assembly authority in spite of the new members which have increased the potential power of the Afro-Asian nations. Mr. Bancroft pointed out that in actual practice such blocs are seldom unified enough to vote all together on major issues.

Mr. Bancroft warned that in working through the UN, the US must not merely obey the majority, but must take leadership in devising solutions to international problems.

Mr. Fisher posed certain questions to focus group discussion. He pointed out that the Assembly is unwieldy as a body to administer a UN force. How can this be overcome, he asked? The command of a UN force should be under the Secretariat, but will all nations have confidence in the impartiality of the Secretariat?

The UN, Mr. Fisher noted, had put troops into Egypt, but not into Hungary. If this seems unjust, he asked, would it have been better to have had no UN at all, or for the UN to have done nothing in either case?

The session was opened to general discussion by the Chairman, and many searching questions from the participants were met with earnest response from Mr. Bancroft and the panel members.

From this discussion, it appeared to be clear that there was consensus in the group on two aspects of the question.

First, in spite of the new responsibilities, and even powers, of the Assembly, the new members, and the old voting system, there was a common belief that the US should continue to make the UN the cornerstone of its foreign policy, that it should act within the UN as much as possible, and that diplomatic negotiations outside the UN should be in the main used to underpin the efforts of the UN itself.

Second, there seemed to be general agreement that the UN should have in being at least the nucleus of a peace force which could aid in achieving peaceful settlements, not as a fighting force, but as the symbol of world moral opinion.

Questions from the group indicated also several areas of common concern on which more study was needed, or new efforts should be made.

There was considerable interest in the possibility of UN legal procedures to back up the functions of a UN force, if they are to operate as international police.

Concern was also expressed that the International Court of Justice might be used more effectively both in the peaceful settlement of disputes and interpretation of the Charter.

Present concepts of national sovereignty were recognized as a stumbling block to effective UN and International Court efforts. Participants seemed to feel that modification of absolute sovereignty was desirable. It was suggested that sovereignty was not the only principle in the Charter, and that legal minds might be able to find a formulation by which other Charter principles might be capable of overriding it.

Some participants felt that Charter amendments should be considered in relation both to disarmament and to the UN force. Time did not permit a very exhaustive discussion of that question, which might also be the object of further study.

The factual statements of the speakers had done much to allay the fears of the group as to the possibility of adverse action being effected by bloc voting in the Assembly. Nevertheless, it was evident that the group recognized the need for careful consultation by UN delegates with both the Western powers and the Asian-African nations in the interest of furthering responsible action by the UN to achieve peace with justice for all.

In summary, it may be said that the group as a whole was more than ever confident of the essential role of the United Nations, and that its attitude toward the new challenge of the Assembly was one of willingness to support new methods, and to pursue thoughtful studies as to the ways and means for further strengthening the United Nations.

New Dimensions for Economic Development

The Section on "New Dimensions for Economic Development" met under the chairmanship of Wallace J. Campbell, Cooperative League of USA. The speakers were Roy Blough, Columbia University, and Reuben G. Gustavson, Resources for the Future. Panelists were Daniel Benedict, AFL-CIO; Halvor O. Ekern, Office of Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, Department of State; and Theodore Geiger, National Planning Association. Edward F. Snyder, Friends Committee on National Legislation, was rapporteur. Following is Mr. Snyder's report.

The Section . . . was very ably led by Wallace Campbell and it was most appropriately begun by Reuben Gustavson who spoke of the application of atomic energy for peaceful purposes as one of these very important new dimensions . . . He reminded us that atomic research and development has been accomplished by no one country's scientists . . . He indicated very briefly just some of the benefits which atomic energy . . . can bestow in producing fertilizers, in increasing the productivity of plants, in telling man about the extent and flow of underground water, and in treating many of man's most terrible diseases.

Roy Blough . . . pointed out that industrialization is only a part of economic development, which also includes development of agriculture, transportation facilities, power resources, and so on. He made three points. . . .

1. That the less developed countries are extremely anxious to industrialize.

2. That capital is not their only need. They need skilled labor and skilled management. There must not be a rigid social structure which prevents the development of talent. Age-old customs and attitudes often stand in the way of rapid industrialization.

3. That the kinds of capital used to assist industrialization are important. Both public and private capital are needed. . . .

Roy Blough also discussed the UN Technical Assistance Program. He pointed out that in the last six years, 78 countries have pledged over $142 million to the special fund . . .; experts from 77 countries and the facilities and experience of 105 countries and territories have aided 131 countries and territories; 5,000 experts have gone out; 10,000 fellowships for training have been granted. The nations receiving assistance have contributed local currency expenses of from $60 million to $65 million.

These very significant figures were brought out — the per capita contributions to the UNETAP showed: first, Canada with 13.2¢ per person; then Denmark, Norway and Sweden; and US fifth with 9.5¢ per capita. . . .

There are many new fields which have not yet been touched in this area of technical assistance. Even without these new fields, the Expanded Program could constructively use $50 million a year, which is nearly twice as much as the present program . . . Yet the US Congress last year approved an amendment which limits future US contributions to the UNETAP to ⅓ of all contributions. In past years it has been 50%. So, if this amendment stands, the US contribution to this program will be cut approximately one-third. . . .

Mr. Blough also outlined one other problem — the question of the administration of the Technical Assistance Programs of the UN and the Specialized Agencies. At present the US makes its contribution to the UN Expanded Program. But certain farm organizations . . . have advocated separate US contributions . . . He pointed out that the cooperation and coordination achieved through the Expanded Program saves money, minimizes confusion, and obviates frustration. . . .

Dan Benedict pointed out that apparently one strong argument put forward for separate contributions to each of the various specialized agencies was that the Soviet Union was not a member of the Food and Agriculture Organization. But the Soviet Union can become a member of FAO at any time if it chooses to do so.

More basically, the US must determine whether it desires to meet the challenge of communism in the world or pull out and leave the field to communist countries.

He also pointed out the great need for a SUNFED program for the underdeveloped countries and the values of such a program to the US.

Theodore Geiger reminded us . . . that never before has there been such a concerted and cooperative effort to spread technical knowledge and skills . . .; that in the last analysis this whole program comes down to people and that lack of properly trained persons is one of the biggest restricting factors in the whole technical assistance field. . . .

The following findings are drawn from the statements of the speakers, of the panel members and from the comments from the floor. . . .

1. To date, the development of atomic power has resulted largely from national efforts to increase military strength. Atomic energy can, however, be of the greatest benefit to mankind in all his activities. But man can enter into this new era of abundance only if he can parallel his technological and scientific skills with a growing reverence for life, appreciation of human dignity, and a willingness to cooperate for the good of all. . . .

2. The creation of the International Atomic Energy Agency will open up a new dimension in the field of technical assistance and economic development. All nations, whether highly industrialized or underdeveloped, can benefit from this program. . . .

3. The Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency . . . should be approved overwhelmingly by the US Senate.

4. Despite the emphasis on economic development by the underdeveloped countries, the gap in productivity between the highly developed countries and the less developed countries is widening. Means must be found to increase the rate of development in less advanced countries while developing and strengthening democratic institutions. If such methods are not available to these nations, they may sacrifice freedom for economic development. There is an urgent need for a much larger long-range economic development program channelled, wherever possible, through the UN.

5. The UN is the most acceptable channel for supplying technical skills and capital to the less economically developed countries. The UN Expanded Technical Assistance Program should be increased to the limit of its capacity. The US should contribute its full share to the UNETAP and should not be restricted by an arbitrary one-third limitation. At the same time, the US technical assistance and humanitarian economic aid programs should be continued.

6. The US should vigorously support the creation of a Special UN Fund for Economic Development or a similar program to supplement the work of the Technical Assistance Programs and to finance the construction of facilities which offer no satisfactory return to private capital but which create the conditions under which private investment can contribute substantially to economic development. SUNFED should be undertaken now when it is needed to raise living standards, reduce tensions and help create stable, free governments, rather than awaiting the signing of a disarmament agreement.

7. A worldwide program of technical assistance is obviously complex and it is therefore necessary to coordinate the work of the technical assistance programs of the UN and the specialized agencies. The US should continue to make its contribution to the Expanded Program . . . rather than breaking up this contribution into separate sums for the UN and the specialized agencies. . . .

8. The US should actively meet the challenge of the presence in the UN and in the specialized agencies of nations having differing ideologies . . . and should not withdraw because such nations are members.

9. A key problem facing both the US and the UN technical assistance programs is the lack of persons with adequate skills, tolerance, respect for differing cultures, and willingness to work in less economically developed countries. New efforts should be made to recruit, train, and properly use and compensate persons for these programs.

10. Further exploration should be made of the role which the technical assistance programs of the non-governmental organizations, educational institutions, and foundations can play in supplementing technical assistance programs of the various nations and of international organizations. Cooperatives should be encouraged in underdeveloped countries.

11. . . . all organizations and individuals are encouraged to give active support to greatly expanded efforts in the technical assistance and economic development field. . . .

To Promote Justice for the Individual: Should the US Ratify International Conventions?

The Section on "Should the United States Ratify International Conventions?" met under the chairmanship of Dean C. J. Nuesse, Catholic University of America. The keynote speaker was Congressman Henry Reuss of Wisconsin. Panel members were: Roger N. Baldwin, American Civil Liberties Union; Frieda Miller, former Technical Assistance Expert, ILO; Harry Pollak, AFL-CIO; Morris S. Rosenthal, Vice Chairman, Arbitration Commission, International Chamber of Commerce; and Quincy Wright, Professor of International Law. Will Maslow, American Jewish Congress, was the rapporteur. We present below Mr. Maslow's report.

. . . The answer from the panelists [to the above question] was unanimously "yes," and I would say that the overwhelming consensus in the audience was similarly "yes."

I think perhaps therefore I would be most helpful if I were to summarize the discussion during our sessions. . . .

Perhaps the best way this story can be told is chronologically. From 1946 to 1953 the United States played its rightful role, and perhaps we might almost use the term leading role, in the United Nations in the effort to promote human rights. Our own Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt was chariman of the Commission on Human Rights and during that period the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was promulgated . . . The same period also witnessed the promulgation of the Genocide Convention to which now 55 countries have acceded.

In 1953, however, a threat to this whole move developed when Senator Bricker of Ohio proposed his so-called Bricker Amendment . . . What Senator Bricker was trying to do was to prevent the US from entering into multilateral treaties which affected civil rights or which in any way encroached upon the rights of States. He also sought to prevent the US Government from increasing its powers to enact legislation by the enactment of treaties.

Originally this move had a great deal of at least nominal support in the Senate. At this point, Secretary Dulles in his testimony in April 1953 [before a Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee] although he opposed the Bricker Amendment on behalf of the Administration, announced that the US would no longer participate in the movement to promote human rights by international treaty. And he stated, in fact he pledged, that the US Government would not submit any such treaties for ratification.

Thus, although Senator Bricker was not able to achieve the two-thirds vote for his amendment required by the Constitution, he was able by intimidation to accomplish all that he sought. And some of the audience felt that the Bricker Amendment was still a potential threat.

Since that time in 1953 no multilateral treaties for the promotion of human rights have been signed by our Government. The one convention, the Genocide Convention, which had been signed and indeed submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, languished there. The State Department has taken no action to hasten its ratification.

And, lastly, we have even gone further and announced in advance to the UN that we will not sign any treaty before we even know the provisions of the treaty.

Our representatives in the UN are apparently unwilling or unable to tell the international community that it is the fear of Senator Bricker and what he stands for that prompts this abdication of US responsibility. And, therefore, all sorts of answers are given . . . When the Slavery Convention, a Convention to which the US became a party in 1926, was being revised last year, our representative announced that we would not sign the convention because there is no slavery in the United States.

There are comparable situations, as Mr. Morris Rosenthal . . . pointed out to us. The US now has a Federal Statute which allows the Federal Courts to recognize a commercial arbitration award made in another country. An effort was made by treaty to expand this concept of having the courts of one's own country recognize these commercial arbitration agreements which are so necessary in the conduct of international trade. Our Government not only refused to sign the treaty or to participate in its drafting, it strenuously opposed even placing the subject on the agenda of the Economic and Social Council.

The net result is that the foreign businessman can obtain recognition of a commercial arbitration award in this country, but the American businessman cannot obtain it in other countries. . . .

Since then there have been other conventions promulgated by the UN, conventions on the political rights of women, the status of married women, conventions on dependency and so on, but none of these has been signed by the US.

When Secretary Dulles announced this new policy of the United States in 1953, he advanced a substitute which was called the US Action Program . . . The Program consists of three parts. It is the Program now followed by our representatives in the United Nations.

In lieu of promoting human rights by treaty, it was proposed, first, that member states should sumbit annual reports to a United Nations body on the progress of civil rights.

Second, that the Secretariat should offer technical assistance to any country that sought it in promoting civil rights.

And, third, that United Nations organs should undertake studies of individual civil rights. . . .

The panel felt that this new Action Program was accomplishing very little. It was pointed out that first of all when a member state of the UN reports on what is happening in its country, that report is hardly likely to be an accurate picture of denial of civil rights. It is more likely to be misleading than helpful.

Second, as far as the technical assistance is concerned, when a country asks the UN to provide technical assistance in order to improve civil rights and civil liberties, it is in such an advanced state that it does not need that assistance and can get it elsewhere very easily.

And, third, it was pointed out that because of the very method by which the UN operates, it is difficult to get out of such a body a critical study dealing with controversial matters . . . So we cannot look to these organs of the UN to promote studies that will become classics in their field. On the contrary, more useful work is likely to come from individual scholars who are not tied down because they are representatives of their Government.

It was pointed out, I think by Professor Wright, that this move to promote human rights by multilateral treaties, is not merely a humanitarian effort, but that there are national interests of the US that are being served by such treaties. He pointed out, for example, that we cannot control narcotics traffic except by international action. He pointed out likewise that in the propaganda phase of the cold war we were unduly hampering ourselves when Russia recognizes and signs the Genocide Convention and the US does not. We simply put ourselves in a ridiculous position in the United Nations.

Finally, it was pointed out that raising living standards and reducing tensions were all means of helping to reduce the possibilities of war, the chief reason for the creation of the United Nations.

Professor Wright also pointed out that one of the great weaknesses of the new Action Program of the State Department is that it left untouched the basic difficulty in this area, the problem of domestic jurisdiction . . . As long as you are dealing only with reports and studies and technical assistance, a country like South Africa can insist that the UN has no jurisdiction to deal with its domestic problems. However, once a treaty is signed, then the problem is no longer a domestic question. It becomes a question of international law and the fulfillment or non-fulfillment of that obligation is an international question.

In conclusion, the panel felt that the most helpful way in which the UN could proceed was not by attempting to draft a complete catalogue of human rights (this effort has only led to interminable discussion and wrangling because the nations in the world, in different stages of development, necessarily had different notions as to what was primary and salient), but that the best method of proceeding was by dealing with one right at a time, e.g. slavery, genocide, arbitrary exile, discrimination, and education and so on.

Finally, the panel agreed that perhaps one of the best methods to get some action in our own country was to get some support for the resolution advanced by Senator Humphrey, I think it is Senate Joint Resolution 117, in which Senator Humphrey called upon the State Department to sign and submit to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee these treaties designed to promote human rights . . . The panel also stressed the importance of more education in the grass roots, particularly among teachers in public schools.

Dear Gustave:

It was good to talk with you yesterday about the possibilities of my stopping off in Dallas to talk with the AJC. This I shall be glad to do.

I am writing our Director, Ed Kloppe, in Austin about inviting you to the inter-agency meeting to be held on October 11 and 12. I have asked him to make hotel reservations for you the night of the 11th.

You asked for some biographical material about me. I was reared in south Florida, received my A.B. and M.A. degrees at the University of Miami, and did my doctoral work at the Center for Human Relations Studies at New York University. During World War II I served as an officer in Naval Air Intelligence. I taught at the University of Miami in the Department of Human Relations for three years. I have been with the Southern Regional Council as Assistant Director for the past three years.

I trust this is sufficient information for your purpose.

Best regards.

Dear Gus:

Thank you for your letter of October 24 with the many enclosures. Unfortunately they did not include a copy of the material on the economic aspects of this problem which you showed me on the plane between Austin and Dallas. I would still very much like to have a copy of this particular clip.

I am arriving in Dallas on the 5th as scheduled on Delta flight 911, arriving in Dallas at 1.02 in the afternoon and I shall leave Dallas for Atlanta the next morning at 8.25. Would you please make reservations for me at the Adolphus or the Baker?

I shall be glad to comply with the twenty minutes restriction. As a friend of mine from Texas said: "If you can't strike oil in twenty minutes quit boring." As to paying for my expenses I will submit a voucher upon my return to Atlanta and you can reimburse the Council.

Dear Fred:

I delayed my letter to you about your visit to Dallas on November 5 until I was able to send you an announcement of this event, which is enclosed herewith. We are looking forward to having you with us.

Would you want me to make a hotel reservation for you or will you take care of this matter yourself. How long do you plan to remain in Dallas?

The program will be divided into two parts, 1) A background statement by yourself and 2) An audience discussion period. Please note that the meeting will begin at 8:00 P.M. and adjourn at 10:00 P.M. followed by a social hour.

We would like you to give an overall review and development of the desegregation issue in the south; the preparation necessary for communities to make, collectively and individually, in order to avoid the breakdown of law and order; the role and responsibility of the citizen in affecting a peaceful solution to the problem; and the challenge which the Dallas community will have to face in the implementation of the integration process in February.

This background statement should not exceed 20 minutes and should pose rather than resolve the problem for the purpose of stimulating and guiding the discussion which will follow. I realize that this is a large order, but I know that you are well-qualified to handle the situation. You will also have the opportunity to speak about your Southern Regional Council, its aims and program. The discussion period will afford you the opportunity of amplifying your remarks and to answer questions which will undoubtedly be thrown at you.

Have you heard from Ed Kloppe? He was in Dallas for 2 days last week, but I have not received any further word from him. How is the inventory proceeding? During your Dallas visit, I would like to arrange a meeting for you with a local layman who is playing a leadership role in the type of program which we considered effective at

Dear Gus

Carroll Jacob called and asked me to send you a report on the Griffin meeting last evening.

About 2700 persons turned out, a polyglot audience and one it was difficult to assess. About 50 state legislators attended an earlier dinner sponsored by the Citizens Council honoring Griffin, and most of them actually made it to the meeting.

Martin Dies introduced Griffin, in a nice rabble-rouser--but the rabble did not rouse. There was repeated applause, usually on cue, but there was something lacking. Dies attacked, by thinly veiled innuendo, Lyndon Johnson and Sam Rayburn for their part in the civil rights bill.

Griffin's speech was a pitch for a 3rd party to unify the south, and an offer to be the man on the white horse.

Both Griffin and Bob Milner, the Houston oil man who is one of the prime movers of Citizens Council and chairman of the event, repeatedly made the point that segregation is no longer the issue, but states rights was the cause. Both repudiated use of force and violence (although a few weeks ago Milner offered to recruit 2000 Texans to march to the defense of Little Rock. He could have afforded it, too.)

The speeches were hackneyed, and there is no pointing in wearing out a typewriter ribbon quoting them.

Literature was distributed, mostly reprint stuff from the American Mercury, Free Men Speak, etc. Only one piece, quoting some of McQuire's pieces from American Mercury, could be construed as anti-semitic. One piece attacked the Texas Baptist Convention.

From my observation few persons were responding to the membership drive in Citizens Council and not many more were seen making contributions to the pretty, but somewhat shopworn, ladies soliciting (contributions, that is).

In a word, it was a dull meeting; suprisingly sedate and well mannered; and much below the excitement level of one of our typical hot precinct meetings during the gubernatorial election.

The platform committee was made up of an amalgam of Citizens Council, Minute Women and Constitution Party notables.

One of the aftermaths (can there be a plural) will be a hassle with our Citizen Council superintendent of schools and Minute Women board over the use of two high school groups (band and glee club) to entertain. Some of the clergymen, who were involved in our earlier statement, have been protesting, and several of our school board members have agreed to take the matter up at the next meeting of the school board.

Milner felt that criticism was growing sufficiently so that he had to comment on the non-radical nature of Citizens Council, a criticism that has gained considerable courrency among the clergy--radicals being those who resort to lawlessness and violence to contravene the law.

And on that good word, I'll conclude.

Governor Of Georgia Slated For Talk Here

Gov Marvin Griffin of Georgia, who refused to attend President Eisenhower's conference with a group of Southern governors Tuesday when Eisenhower broadened the discussion beyond the question of removal of federal troops, from Little Rock, Ark., will speak in Houston Tuesday, Oct 22.

Gov. Griffin will speak at the Music Hall at 8 p.m. The public will be invited and there will be no admission charge.

The invitation was made during the visit of a group of prominent Houstonians to Atlanta last week.

Constitution, Rights

His subject will be "The Constitution and States Rights." He is expected to deal with the Little Rock situation and the use of federal troops there.

Griffin was one of five governors named at the conference of governors to meet with Eisenhower after the President sent troops into the Arkansas capital to force admission of nine Negro children to a high school there.

However, Gov Griffin said the President had not agreed to limit the discussion to removal of the troops, and refused to attend.

Reservation

He telegraphed Gov. Luther Hodges of North Carolina, head of the governors' conference, saying he would not discuss with the President at this meeting "the operation of public schools of Georgia."

Griffin was elected governor in 1954 after serving as lieutenant governor. He is a Bainbridge, Ga., newspaper publisher.

GOV MARVIN GRIFFIN
States Rights Speech

Griffin To Speak Here; Sponsorship Is Uncertain

The Citizens Council of America in Texas, Inc, has rented the Music Hall for the night of Oct 22 for an address by Gov Marvin Griffin of Georgia, Francis Deering, director of the City Public Properties Division said Friday.

Despite this, and the fact that Deering said the Council's recording secretary, Mrs Sam H. Davis, made the reservation, Council Chairman Robert L. Milner said the organization isn't sponsoring Griffin's appearance.

MILNER, WHO asked that his and other council officials' names not be used, said the $300 rental fee was being paid by "several patriotic organizations."

Gov Griffin is to speak at 8 PM on "The Constitution and States Rights." The public has been invited to hear the address and no admission will be charged.

Gov Griffin this week refused to attend a conference of Southern governors in Washington with President Eisenhower. He said he withdrew from the conference when Mr Eisenhower indicated he would broaden the discussions to cover other integration matters than the withdrawal of federal troops from Central High School in Little Rock, Ark.

THE GEORGIA chief executive wired Gov Luther Hodges of North Carolina, head of the governor's conference, that he would not discuss "the operation of public schools of Georgia" in the meeting with Mr. Eisenhower.

The 50-year-old governor is a native of Georgia and a newspaper publisher and radio station owner.

HE GOT HIS political start in 1935, winning a seat in the Georgia General Assembly. He served until 1936 when he moved up to become executive secretary to the governor. From 1944 through 1947 he was adjutant general and in 1948 became lieutenant governor. Griffin moved into the governor's mansion in 1951.

Georgia's Gov Griffin Advised To 'Stay Home'

Houston Post 10/7/57

CORPUS CHRISTI — (AP) — The Corpus Christi Caller-Times Sunday advised Gov Marvin Griffin of Georgia to "stay home."

The comment followed reports that "an unidentified group of prominent Houstonians," had invited Griffin to speak there Oct 22 on "The Constitution and States' Rights."

"NO THOUGHTFUL Texan will welcome this aggressive advocate of white supremacy and militant segregationist to the Lone Star State," the Caller-Times said.

"For Griffin has left his ominous footprints in Arkansas. Texas neither wants nor needs his footprints here."

"The Texas approach to the integration of its public schools is exclusively a Texas problem. It is admittedly one of the most serious problems that has faced the state—at least the eastern part—since 1861. No outside agitator, whether it be John Kasper or Marvin Griffin, has any place in Texas trying to tell Texans how to run their business."

● Gov Marvin Griffin will speak in Houston at 8 PM Tuesday, Oct 22, at the Music Hall.

ALTHOUGH THE Citizens Council of America in Texas, Inc, rented the hall, it denied sponsorship.

Georgia Governor Urges Racist Unity

HOUSTON (AP)—Gov. Marvin Griffin of Georgia last night called for formation of "the biggest, most resolute organization in the South we have ever had" to halt integration and protect states' rights.

"The time has come in the South when we must unite," Griffin told an audience of 2,700 predominantly pro-segregationists which included 60 members of the Texas Legislature.

"If we organize, become resolute, nothing will be able to move us, not one foot," Griffin said.

He said he wouldn't be a candidate for President in 1960, but would support a third party candidate, "if it means the salvation of this country and the protection of the people's rights under the Constitution."

The entire crowd joined in singing "Dixie" and "The Eyes of Texas" to the music of a white high school band. During the meeting several persons in the audience waved small Confederate flags.

"MONSTROUS SITUATION"

Griffin said the Supreme Court desegregation rulings have brought the South "face to face with a monstrous situation which threatens . . . strife never before seen in our country."

Criticizing President Eisenhower's dispatch of troops to Little Rock, Griffin said the action would set a precedent, which if allowed to continue, "will sound the death-knell of constitutional government as we have known it in America."

He said Southern states were "falling in line to win this battle through legal means and through court action." He said the South is "unanimously opposing violent measures of any kind."

COURT VIEWS HIT

Gov. Griffin said the desegregation rulings ignored state constitutions and long-standing precedents.

"Instead, the court based its rulings on the opinions of certain individuals which the court termed 'modern authorities' in the field of psychology, sociology and anthropology," he said.

Griffin charged that Democratic and Republican leaders "have been vying with each other to see who could drive the knife deeper into the backs of the people of the South."

He said he was not a moderate and warned Southern politicians that "no longer can they pussy-foot" on segregation.

His speech was sponsored by the Citizens Council of America in Texas, Inc., a pro-segregation organization.

Griffin and his party were to fly to Georgia today.

DALLAS - DESEGREGATION

Times Call for Statesmanship

THE INTEGRATION crisis has so many aspects—legal, social, moral, political and practical—that it is difficult for anyone to appreciate its full significance.

Not since the War Between the States has there come up any domestic situation more disturbing to the public and more conductive to discord and bitterness than the current one.

Thus far the controversy has been characterized more by emotional outbursts and uncautious official action than by calm deliberation, patience and forethought. Zealots on both sides of the question have dominated the picture and have made more difficult the task of citizens and authorities who wish to solve peaceably the problems involved.

If the crisis continues to generate bitterness and violence the real sufferers will be the children, both Negro and white. They will be psychologically upset, their classwork will be interrupted, and, in some states, public school systems may be wrecked.

Politicians are speculating on how the controversy will affect their respective parties, when they might be better employed in considering the welfare of the children and in seeking a wise solution for a problem that can be solved only by patriotic statesmanship. To paraphrase an old saw, it is time for all parties to come to the aid of their country.

The Supreme Court precipitated the crisis and the high tribunal in its wisdom should be able to clarify its position and simplify the practical task of executives who are guided by its decrees. The Constitution was established to, among other things, "insure domestic tranquillity," and it must be interpreted to that end if it is to "promote the general welfare."

When the ominous threat of atomic warfare hangs over all mankind, and when sinister foes of our way of life are rampant, it is deplorable for citizens of the United States and their constituted officials to speak and act as though they gave no thought to the consequences of their statements and actions. If there ever was a time for calmness on the part of our public and our officialdom, that time is now.

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

COMMUNITY AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

HOW SOUTHERN COMMUNITIES CAN PREVENT THE DETERIORATION OF GROUP RELATIONS UNDER THE IMPACT OF SEGREGATIONIST AGITATION

Findings and Recommendations Based on Visits to Little Rock, Ark., Memphis, Tenn., and Nashville, Tenn. in October, 1957.

S. ANDHIL FINEBERG

SUMMARY:

Governor Faubus has galvanized all elements of the South from the most respectable to the most disreputable in what they consider to be a last ditch defense of their most cherished mores. The segregation issue has taken a place in popular thought far beyond its true importance. Other questions of public interest have gone by the board.

While the conflict threatens comparatively few communities with physical violence, it produces widespread divisivness and many subtle forms of cruelty and injustice which inflict great injury on Negroes and also whites who resist the popular views. The danger should not be conceived only in terms of lawlessness and disorder. Channels of communication and freedom of expression have been destroyed in some communities. These essentials of civic life will be destroyed in many more cities unless immediate steps are taken to prevent the kind of social collapse that has occurred in Little Rock.

Circumstances vary greatly in different cities. In the main, the same program can be useful wherever the overwhelming majority of whites are committed to the "Southern way of life." This program must be based on the common denominators of good citizenship which are valid whether one is for desegregation or against it. In most instances this effort must be separate from efforts to further the acceptance of integration.

No one pattern of organization will meet the needs of all areas, or of all the cities that are within one area. Three main types of organization are described in this report. Even where none of these three suggested structures fits the locale or where it is desirable but not feasible, a study of these plans will provide suggestions for interested local citizens from which they can produce a practical design to meet their own needs.

Each of the three organizational plans is described briefly in this report. Much lengthier and more detailed descriptions are available on request in Supplements I, II and III.

Recent interviews in Little Rock, Nashville and Memphis furnished grist for this report. The reporter's conclusions have been influenced also by his observations in Gary, Indiana (1947) and in Baltimore and in Washington (in 1954) during the opening of schools on a desegregated basis there, as well as by conversations in 1957 in some communities where desegregation has not begun (such as Waco, Texas - Baton Rouge, Louisiana - and Meridian, Mississippi). A great amount of reading and discussion regarding developments in other cities (such as Milford, Clinton and Louisville) is also reflected here.

1. The Need for Perspective:

Pressure groups have been forming throughout the South to preserve Southern mores and especially to defeat the attempts of the federal government to enforce the Supreme Court decision requiring school desegregation. These groups, generally known as White Citizens Councils, have four advantages over proponents of desegregation in their own communities. (1) They are organized to achieve their purposes, whereas their opposition is not organized locally. (2) Their goal is extremely popular among the white citizens of the South. In fact, it is "mixing of the races" that is considered immoral, sinful, unethical and even un-Christian, to an extent that Northerners find difficult to comprehend. (3) The weapon of the pro-segregation councils is intimidation, and Southern whites, as well as Negroes, frequently yield to intimidation where race relations are concerned. (4) Ample hate literature is rapidly being produced to serve the purposes of hate fomenting organizations. There is no comparable body of literature that meets the most urgent current need in the South.

How to accomplish desegregation in the South is a gigantic problem which will require an energetic program. But how can one make intelligent progress toward this goal in communities where anything that smacks of helping the Negroes in any way that might break down race barriers, is anathema? In Little Rock a quarter of a century of improvement in race relations through interracial effort has suddenly come to a halt. The most for which the ministers and rabbis dared pray there was (not desegregation) but "support and preservation of law and order, for the leaders of this community, for the casting out of rancor and prejudice in favor of understanding and compassion and for the people's resistance against unthinking agitators."

The leading clergymen of Little Rock were aware that they face an ominous civic problem which engulfs the problem of school desegregation as a major illness dwarfs a lesser one. Desegregation became so hateful to the Little Rock white populace that only the most courageous could defend the policy of our federal government, which is also the policy of their own national church and synagog bodies, of their YMCA's and their YWCA's nationally, of their international labor unions and of other national bodies to which they belong. Not only are the liberals in the minority, but they are potential (and in some instances, actual) scapegoats in areas where there are experts in the art of scapegoating. Unless freedom of speech can be restored, unless channels of communication can be reopened and unless lawlessness, violence and disorder can be made thoroughly unpopular, there will be more divisiveness, boycotting, and bitter animosities, which may not be publicized. Moreover, without preventive measures, the experience of Clinton and Little Rock are likely to be repeated.

Nothing short of a well organized program of public education in each Southern community can prevent great injury to the civic fabric of many communities as the federal government moves on, as it must, to enforce by legal means, the decisions of the Supreme Court. There are excellent reasons why the South should not sacrifice vital interests to preserve the system of separate education for whites and Negroes. But these will have to be convincingly portrayed in programs of education specifically tailored to the situation in the Southern communities. In brief, organized effort is needed in each community to maintain channels of communication, to bring friends of law and order together on the same platforms regardless of their attitudes toward school desegregation, and to make it abundantly clear that there are areas, such as health, transportation, industrial development, family welfare, and the like in which all citizens have a stake regardless of race and religion, and regardless of whether the schools are desegregated. It should become the declared policy of the white citizenry, including the power structure and the masses, to prove the vaunted friendship of the whites for the Negroes is genuine, and that this friendship is too valuable to be destroyed because of debate over one issue -- desegregation.

2. A Contrast in Situations:

Race Relations

In Memphis there has been no progress toward desegregation but there is considerable optimism concerning the relations of whites and Negroes. The Greater Memphis ~~Interracial~~ Committee established in 1954 includes leading white and Negro citizens. The whites and the Negroes meet separately but what transpired at each organization was known to the other and there was informal cooperation. More recently the executive committees of the two organizations have been meeting to discuss matters of mutual interest. The Negro leadership which includes the best educated, most cultured and public spirited members of their community has been asking for certain concessions from the whites, such as desegregation of the buses to the airport. Unless these Negro leaders obtain some such gains, they are not likely to retain their leadership. If the Urban League must leave the Memphis Community Chest, as has happened elsewhere, and if the situation of the Negroes deteriorates in other respects, the Memphis white citizenry may find that far less admirable members of the Negro community, persons with much less concern for the welfare of their fellow-Negroes and for whites will gain prominence and power in the Negro community. However, the existing organizations and the bridge between them constitute a valuable mechanism for maintaining communication and for making the entire citizenry of Memphis conscious of the fact that all share a common fate, regardless of color.

In Nashville a Community Relations Conference was established several years ago. It has always been interracial. At the outset the Conference avoided taking a stand on desegregation but for the past year and more it has stood squarely for school desegregation. Although it was quite inactive during the dramatic days of the school opening in September 1957, when its president was abroad, it had undoubtedly performed great service in preparing for school desegregation. It can be reactivated readily to continue its efforts on behalf of better group relations. As in Memphis, the credentials of the outstanding interracial organization are beyond questioning. Blue-blooded Southerners, as Southern as any, are at the helm.

Little Rock provides a contrast to the organizational situation in Memphis and Nashville. This is the more lamentable because praiseworthy individuals among whites and Negroes have been working together. But they did not have the support and sanction of the power group of the city. Nor did they receive wide public support. The Arkansas Council on Human Relations maintained an executive director whose home has been in Little Rock for two and a half years. But Governor Faubus' sudden manoeuver, which deprived the City of Little Rock of its autonomy and wrecked a situation which would otherwise have been as good as in Nashville, ~~as~~ far as the school situation is concerned, found the citizens of Little Rock ~~un~~ off guard, ~~prepared~~. Belatedly twenty-five leading citizens have sought to straighten out the situation and addressed a statement to Governor Faubus. It is notable that all of the signers of the statement are white.

Memphis faces the advent of desegregation with confidence in a group of citizens united through an established bi-racial arrangement. Nashville has a strong interracial group committed to school desegregation and there the public is breathing more easily, glad that the first step has been taken, the shock survived. Little Rock is in a dilemma too well known to need description and there is no organization that can cope with the situation.

The saddest feature of the entire South-wide situation is that numerous interracial organizations that have been functioning in many cities, allied in most instances to the Southern Regional Council, have lost much of their potency because they are committed in regard to desegregation. They should, of course, continue their endeavors. But another type of organization is needed wherein the strongest possible voices unite to oppose lawlessness and disorder, to maintain communications, to bolster faith in the total community and to create an atmosphere wherein one can speak on behalf of segregation or desegregation without thereby inviting punitive measures. This can only be done by an organization which has exactly that for its purpose and can enlist, at least on some of its public programs, segregationists as well as desegregationists, though not in debate on that subject.

3. The Dangers of Inaction:

The situation in the South is fraught with peril for any group or individual who can be made a scapegoat in the situation which now involves frustration and anger against the tide of events. The tendency among those who fear they may be victimized is to stay out of the debate, to steer clear of identification with the problem, to act as though the controversy over desegregation does not exist. Although they are deeply aware of it, and even panicky about it, many Southerners prefer inaction. This blunder, if made persistently, will be very costly. Nor will dealing with individual incidents here and there help much. The situation resembles that which confronted the Jews of the United States when Nazi inspired anti-Semitism was highly troublesome. As was then the case, a program of public education on a large scale is necessary.

A sad commentary on the situation is that the Superintendent of Schools of Little Rock and the Principal of Central High School (among others) there told this reporter that there is no literature which they can give to the pupils of Central High School which would help them to understand the situation in which these pupils find themselves. There have been excellent Editorials and Letters to the Editor in the Arkansas Gazette (Little Rock) and very good articles in this and other newspapers. But the periodical material does not deal with the question. "What should my conduct (the conduct of a white pupil) be when Negroes become my fellow-students while my parents, other relatives and friends tell me that this is a disgraceful violation of their rights and mine?" In what terms can a teacher tell his pupils that the parents are taking an unwarranted stand?

4. Where Should School Integration Begin?

Experience thus far indicates that integration -- if gradual -- should begin with the first grade. Little children do not arouse the dreaded sex question. The little ones themselves do not become parties to the controversy. They accept children of other races readily. And their parents being younger people, are busy with too many domestic and other problems to come out daily and create scenes around the school. The Little Rock school board was impressed by the successful effort of St. Louis to begin desegregation in the high school. For one thing, it involved fewer pupils and the possibility of selecting the most attractive Negro pupils. But there are more cogent reasons for starting with the youngest grades.

The most enlightened citizens of every community need to be well organized in preparation for integration. What needs to be done has been well outlined on the basis of experiences in Washington, Louisville and elsewhere. "A Guide to School Integration," a pamphlet of the Public Affairs Committee, is an example of the helpful material available on this subject. But other literature is likewise needed, to be used before some Southern communities even begin to discuss integration, and in advance of any program for desegregation of their schools. It is a program that will outlaw lawlessness and provide a united stand against those who make desegregation a vehicle for rabbl-rousing, hate-mongering and insidious attacks upon good citizens. We must face up to a perilous situation which was not anticipated prior to the "Faubus rebellion" and the troops in Little Rock.

5. Why Another Organization?

During the Nashville fracas, before the blowing up of a school building galvanized the citizenry against the White Citizens Council (which is now relatively impotent, as it is in Memphis) there was a Parents' Preference Committee, which made the papers almost daily in Nashville and which by its title and statements gave the impression of great resistance to desegregation. It added strength to the segregationists' arms. This Parent's Preference Committee received press notices throughout the United States and probably abroad too. It is now reliably reported that this very potent organization consisted of exactly two people. At least, they had the good sense to organize and select an impressive name.

Dynamic movements with small membership have often demonstrated that several or even many organizations can be formed and dissolved by the same people with alacrity and great effect. The announcement that an organization has been formed to Protect the Rights of the Foreign Born or to Promote Peace between the United States and Country X, has an effect on public opinion. When the organization can be launched with the most respected names and when it does conduct public programs, it can accomplish a great deal.

In most Southern cities it has been difficult to obtain the support of the most economically, socially and politically influential citizens for interracial organizations which endorse desegregation. The people who have the best status prefer to maintain the status quo. But it is now very much to the advantage of the power group, as well as the middle class, and of all others who have a stake in society to form and to endorse an organization that, without taking a stand on desegregation, will provide a positive program of public education beneficial to all citizens. That some of the people will be active in pro-desegregation organizations should not prevent their joining with a neutral organization to maintain civic tranquility.

One may well ask, "Why a new organization? Why not an existing one?" The answer as is that all reputable existing organizations would cooperate with a body that has its one main central purpose exactly what is recommended here. In Nashville, for example, when an Institute is held by the Conference on Human Relations every reputable local organization is invited to send representatives. Most do. A statement issued by THE CIVIC RELATIONS COUNCIL -- this is probably the best name to avoid all misunderstandings -- can be endorsed by many organizations.

Wherever it is impossible to get the most influential citizens to walk the two miles to desegregation, there should be no reluctance to walk the one mile that all good citizens can go together to prevent civic catastrophe. Meanwhile each person may belong to a dozen other organizations with diverse purposes and interests.

6. Varying Types of Organizations and Programs:

Will it be the Memphis plan or the Nashville plan or some other plan that will be best suited to a particular community? That depends on the present state of opinion Who constitute the local leadership? Who can muster the moral support of all decent elements of the community and what kind of organization will they support? Supplements to this report describe:

I. An interracial organization consisting of a white and of a Negro section, with Executive Committees that meet.

II. An all white Council that invites Negroes to participate in its public forums and discussions.

III. An interracial organization wherein members of both races participate fully.

Each of these supplements describes the steps needed to form the described type of organization. Here let it be said that the basic idea is patterned after what was done after the Detroit and Harlem riots when Human Relations Commissions were formed in many cities to carry on the programs which they have been conducting since their formation.

Here the structure (because of the ferocity of the racial issue) may have to be different in many cities. Here the program will likewise have different emphases. The methods of operation (Institutes, forums, publicity etc.) will be quite comparable. But it all adds up to definite goals for organizations established to conduct public education programs.

Will more riots occur before those who are most likely to be hurt initiate steps to meet the need? It is obvious that whatever public announcements are to appear, should be made by people who are in the least vulnerable positions. There will need to be small organizing meetings of perhaps five people, then fifteen, then the fifty whom the fifteen invite. But a few people who care must start the ball rolling with a feasible plan.

Dear Gus:

It was good to be with your group in Dallas. I am much impressed with their alertness and sensitivity to the problems which the Dallas community faces. I was sorry that you and I did not have more of an opportunity to chat and discuss the inter-agency cooperative effort in the Dallas area.

I am enclosing my expense account for the trip. Please have the check made out to the Southern Regional Council. I hope you still feel that my participation was worth the expenses involved. Please keep me informed on developments out there and if we can be of further help don't hesitate to yell.

Warm personal regards to you and your good spouse.

Dear Gus:

Many thanks for your letter of the 13th, with the enclosed check. Thank you too for the kind words about my participation in the AJC meeting.

I trust that things are going well in the Texas inter-agency cooperative effort and that you, Ed Kloppe, and others are hitting hard in the Dallas area. I would suggest that your steering committee get together in the near future and have a progress report on what has thus far been done and plan next steps.

I just returned to the office today from the field which will account for the delay in thanking you for your address at the Chapter Discussion Group Meeting on Tuesday, November 5, 1957.

Everyone enjoyed your participation which gave tone and quality to the animated discussion meeting. You have indeed set a high goal for subsequent meetings.

I wish to add my personal expression of appreciation to you for your contribution. Your presentation was direct, concise, informative and interesting. I look forward to your return to Dallas. It is always a pleasure to cooperate with you.

Dear Gus:

Many thanks for your letter of December 6. I am glad to hear that on your suggestion Ed Kloppe is preparing a report of his findings on Dallas. Unfortunately Ed is uncommunicative and I am not as closely abreast of the Dallas situation as I would hope to be. Please advise me of the date of the next meeting of the steering committee and I will make every effort to attend. It is imperative that representative Negro leaders be brought into the planning at this time. Without this leadership the group cannot enjoy the confidence of the Negro community. Without that confidence the group can have little significance.

Dear Friend:

Enclosed is a new report of the Commission on Law and Social Action, describing the 15 state anti-discrimination agencies and the law they administer. Copies of this report were distributed at the recent Governors' Conference on Discrimination in Employment.

The report shows that over the years, the number of states with fair employment laws has increased steadily, so that 41 per cent of the population of the entire United States is now protected by anti-discrimination legislation. The fact that two states which began with "voluntary compliance" laws later added compulsory enforcement machinery indicates the growing recognition that anti-discrimination agencies need enforcement powers to do their jobs properly. Thirteen of the 15 agencies described have power to issue orders enforceable in the courts.

The report shows also that America's perception of what constitutes socially harmful discrimination has broadened since the first anti-bias laws were passed in 1945. While the various state agencies originally dealt only with employment problems, many have since been given jurisdiction over public accommodations, public or publicly-assisted housing and education.

The budget figures show how little anti-discrimination agencies cost the public: in 1956 the highest per capita cost was in Rhode Island -- 4.5 cents per year.

I would be happy to receive your comments.

We enclose a summary and analysis of the Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs Fair Housing Bill recently approved by the New York City Council. Final approval by the Board of Estimate and Mayor Wagner is expected before the end of the year. The text of the bill appears in the appendix to the enclosed report.

This is the first bill enacted in any part of the country prohibiting discrimination in a significant section of the general or "private" housing market. It applies to all multiple dwellings (that is, buildings with three or more apartments), including existing as well as new structures. It also applies to one and two family houses sold in projects of ten or more homes.

As the enclosed analysis suggests, the enforcement features that appear in the final version of the bill are regarded as unduly cumbersome by the civil rights groups that supported the bill originally. However, despite these features, the bill is workable.

It is expected that efforts will be made during the 1958 New York State legislative session to obtain fair housing legislation applicable to the whole state.

THE NEW YORK CITY
SHARKEY-BROWN-ISAACS
FAIR HOUSING BILL OF 1957

A SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

Opponents of inequality throughout the country will welcome the action of the New York City Council, on December 5, in approving the Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs Fair Housing Bill. Approval of the bill by the City Board of Estimate and by Mayor Robert F. Wagner, which is expected by the end of December, will complete enactment of a precedent-setting law comparable to the first fair employment and fair education measures. The bill, which was sponsored by the New York State Committee on Discrimination in Housing, for the first time prohibits discrimination in a significant part of the general housing market. The text of the bill appears in the Appendix.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

The bill prohibits discrimination based on race, religion or national origin in multiple dwellings(that is, buildings containing three or more apartments) and in one and two family homes sold in projects of ten or more contiguous lots. Religious institutions are specifically permitted to prefer or limit admission in housing accommodations they operate to members of their own denomination. There is also an exemption for persons who sub-let rooms in their own apartments.

Any person believing he has been discriminated against in violation of the law may file a written complaint with the Commission on Intergroup Relations, an agency established by the City in 1955. On receiving such a complaint, the Commission will investigate the matter and attempt to conciliate it and to eliminate any discrimination it finds to exist. The Commission is also expressly empowered to initiate such action, without first receiving a complaint, whenever it has reason to believe that a violation has occurred.

If the Commission fails to eliminate a violation, it will formulate its recommendations and refer the matter to a Fair Housing Practices Panel, newly established by the bill. This will consist of 12 persons appointed by the Mayor, to serve without pay. Each time the Commission refers a case to the Panel, the Mayor will select three Panel members as a Fair Housing Practices Board, to review the case and decide whether court action is warranted. The Board is given power to hold hearings and issue subpoenas. (The Commission already has those powers under the law that established it.) If the Board decides in favor of court action, it will direct the Corporation Counsel, the city's legal officer, to bring a court action to enforce the law.

The bill declares that the proceedings before the Commission and the Board shall be "confidential."

The bill will not go into effect until April 1, 1958.

ANALYSIS

Scope of the Bill

When the Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs Bill was introduced in the City Council last May, both city and state laws already prohibited discrimination in public housing and in housing receiving assistance from government agencies. This included housing in which the only form of public assistance was insurance or guarantee of mortgage payments by the FHA or Veterans Administration. The 1954 city law and the 1955 state law prohibiting discrimination in FHA and VA housing were the first to reach a significant part of the housing market. However, they applied only to housing built after the laws went into effect. Thus, the great bulk of housing in New York City was untouched by any anti-discrimination law. In New York City, as in all other parts of the Union, it was perfectly legal for the owner of most property to discriminate in selling or renting housing accommodations.

The new bill, for the first time, reaches the general housing market. However, it does not apply to all housing. Its principal effect will be on multiple dwellings. There, it applies to existing houses as well as those built in the future. In New York City, multiple dwellings are roughly 70% of the total housing market, much larger than in most other American cities.

The provision applying to one and two family homes sold in projects of ten or more houses is not specifically limited to new housing. In effect, however, it is so limited; it is only in new housing that one owner is likely to hold ten contiguous lots. This provision will help to prevent the establishment of rigid segregation patterns in new developments and will therefore have significant effect in outlying areas of New York City. Perhaps more important, it will supply a precedent for future bills in New York State and other parts of the country where single family home projects are a larger part of the housing supply.

Cooperatives

Soon after the bill was introduced, vigorous support developed for adding an exemption for cooperative apartment houses. These are buildings in which most of the residents either own their own apartments or, more commonly, own a share in a company that owns the building. Those favoring an exemption for cooperatives urged that they are like single homes and should, like them, be omitted from the bill. Supporters of the bill were quick to point out that a broad exemption for cooperatives would facilitate evasion because owners of apartment houses could convert them into cooperatives with little loss of control or revenue.

It was then suggested that the bill carry an exemption for existing cooperatives only. That was opposed on principle. In particular, as five Jewish organizations noted in a joint statement, such an exemption would exclude the one form of housing in which discrimination against Jews is most widely encountered. This remained an open issue up to the very day the bill was passed, when it was decided not to include any exemption of cooperatives. Civil rights groups regard this as an important victory.

Enforcement Provisions

In its earliest form, the bill contained simple enforcement provisions; violations were made misdemeanors and, in addition, aggrieved parties could sue for court orders prohibiting discrimination. Shortly after the bill was introduced, objections were expressed to the penal provisions. Accordingly, the sponsors of the bill, with the full support of the civil rights organizations, agreed to substitute a procedure similar to the administrative process commonly employed under state laws against discrimination. Under that procedure, the state agency receives complaints, investigates them and attempts conciliation. Where that fails, the agency holds a public hearing and ultimately issues an order that can be enforced in court. However, since the pending bill was for a municipal law rather than a state statute, the usual administrative procedure could not be paralleled exactly. Hence, it was provided that the existing Commission on Intergroup Relations be given the power to investigate and conciliate and, where it failed to eliminate a discriminatory practice, to initiate a court action in the name of the city for enforcement of the law.

While the bill was pending in the City Council's General Welfare Committee, the suggestion was made that the Commission should not have final say on whether a case should go to court but that an additional agency should be created to screen cases after the Commission had attempted conciliation. This was opposed by the civil rights groups. They urged that the provision was unnecessary and that it would impair the efficacy of the bill by providing a cumbersome enforcement process.

Nevertheless, as already noted, this feature was retained in the final version of the bill, a fact that the supporters of the bill have accepted philosophically. They will inform civil rights advocates in cities considering similar legislation that this aspect of the bill is not regarded as desirable and should not be viewed as a model. In state legislation, of course, enforcement provisions take a different form and this problem is therefore not likely to arise.

Other Provisions

The civil rights groups did not welcome the clause postponing the effective date of the bill to April 1, 1958 but neither did they oppose it. This was added to the bill in its final stages. The Commission on Intergroup Relations can, of course, use the intervening period to initiate an educational campaign.

As already noted, the bill provides that proceedings before the Commission and the Board shall be "confidential." The civil rights groups likewise opposed this provision largely because of its ambiguity. It is difficult at this stage to tell how it will operate in practice. There does not seem to be any way of enforcing it against complainants or newspapers. While the Commission and Board will normally adhere to it without pressure, it appears to be inconsistent with exercise of their powers to subpoena evidence and hold hearings.

CONCLUSION

The new Bill is the long-awaited breakthrough against the most pernicious form of discrimination outside the South. Its shortcomings are procedural and represent no compromise of principle. Citizens throughout the country will now want to consider obtaining similar legislation. Meanwhile, the citizens of New York City face the responsibility of making the new law work.

APPENDIX

NEW YORK CITY FAIR HOUSING BILL

(SHARKEY-BROWN-ISAACS BILL)

As passed by the New York City Council,

December 5, 1957

A LOCAL LAW

To amend the administrative code of the city of New York, in relation to discrimination and segregation in multiple dwellings.

Be it enacted by the Council of The City of New York as follows:

Section 1. Chapter 41 of the administrative code of the city of New York is hereby amended by adding thereto a new title to be title X, to read as follows:

TITLE X

DISCRIMINATION AND SEGREGATION IN PRIVATE DWELLINGS

§ X41-1.0 Certain acts prohibited; penalties.--a. In the city of New York, with its great cosmopolitan population consisting of large numbers of people of every race, color, religion, national origin and ancestry, many persons have been compelled to live in circumscribed sections under substandard, unhealthful, unsanitary and crowded living conditions because of discrimination and segregation in housing. These conditions have caused increased mortality, morbidity, delinquency, risk of fire, intergroup tension, loss of tax revenue and other evils. As a result, the peace, health, safety and general welfare of the entire city and all its inhabitants are threatened. Such segregation in housing also necessarily results in other forms of segregation and discrimination which are against the policy of the state of New York. It results in racial segregation in public schools and other public facilities, which is condemned by the constitutions of our state and nation. In order to guard against these evils, it is necessary to assure to all inhabitants of the city equal opportunity to obtain living quarters, regardless of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the city to assure equal opportunity to all residents to live in decent, sanitary and healthful living quarters, regardless of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry, in order that the peace, health, safety and general welfare of all the inhabitants of the city may be protected and insured.

b. (1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subdivision, no owner, lessee, sub-lessee, assignee, or managing agent of, or other person having the right to sell, rent or lease, a housing accommodation which is located in a multiple dwelling, as defined in section 4 of the multiple dwelling law, or which is offered for sale by a person who owns or otherwise controls the sale of 10 or more one- and two-family houses located on land that is contiguous (exclusive of public streets), or an agent of any of these, shall refuse to sell, rent, lease or otherwise deny to or withhold from any person or group of persons such housing accommodations because of the race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry of such person or persons, or discriminate against or segregate any person because of his race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry in the terms, conditions or privileges of the sale, rental or lease of any such housing accommodations or in the furnishing of facilities or services in connection therewith.

(2) Nothing herein contained shall be construed to bar any religious or denominational institution or organization, or any organization operated for charitable or educational purposes which is operated, supervised or controlled by or in connection with a religious organization, from limiting admission to or giving preference to persons of the same religion or denomination or from making such selection as is calculated by such organization to promote the religious principles for which it is established or maintained.

c. Any person claiming to be aggrieved by a violation of subdivision b hereof may file with the commission on intergroup relations, a complaint in writing which shall state the name and address of the owner or other person alleged to have committed the violation complained of and shall set forth the particulars thereof and such other information as may be required by such commission. Upon the filing of such complaint, or upon its own motion whenever it has reason to believe that any owner or other person has violated subdivision b hereof, such commission shall exercise its powers with a view to conciliating the matter and eliminating any discriminatory practice it finds to exist.

d. In case of failure of the commission on intergroup relations to conciliate and eliminate a practice which it considers discrimination or segregation in violation of subdivision b hereof, it shall refer the same to the fair housing practices panel hereinafter created, with its recommendations.

e. There is hereby created a fair housing practices panel to consist of twelve persons, appointed by the mayor and to serve at his pleasure. Such persons shall not be members of the commission on intergroup relations. The members of the panel shall serve without compensation but shall be entitled to reimbursement of their necessary expenses. For each case that shall be referred to the panel pursuant to subdivision d hereof, the mayor shall designate any three members of the panel as a fair housing practices board which shall exercise the powers and duties provided for in subdivision f hereof.

f. It shall be the duty of the fair housing practices board to review cases of alleged discrimination or segregation in violation of subdivision b hereof, referred by the commission on intergroup relations in accordance with subdivision d hereof and to determine in each case whether in its judgment court action is warranted. The board shall have power to hold hearings and to issue subpoenas. If it shall find in the affirmative, it may direct the corporation counsel to bring equitable proceedings in the supreme court, in the name of the city, for the enforcement of the provisions of this title.

g. Proceedings had under this title before the commission on intergroup relations and the fair housing practices board shall be confidential.

The provisions of this section shall not apply to any tenant of an apartment, as defined in Section 4 of the multiple dwelling law, in which he or members of his family reside, who rents or leases a room or rooms in such apartment to another person or persons.

§ 2. This local law shall take effect April 1, 1958.

A REPORT ON STATE ANTI-DISCRIMINATION AGENCIES AND THE LAWS THEY ADMINISTER

Thirteen states of the Union, containing 37% of the total population of the United States, have established specialized state agencies empowered to administer and enforce laws prohibiting one or more forms of discrimination based on race, religion or national origin. Two other states, with 4% of the population, have created anti-discrimination agencies without enforcement powers. This report summarizes the history of the establishment of these agencies, the scope of their powers and the nature of their operations.

General Summary

All of the thirteen states having enforceable laws prohibit discrimination in employment. In eight of these states, the agency enforcing the law against discrimination in employment is further authorized to prevent discrimination in places of public accommodation, such as hotels, restaurants, theatres and recreation areas. In four states, the anti-discrimination agency is directed to prevent discrimination by educational institutions. (A fifth entrusts this prohibition to the state education authorities.) In seven states, the anti-discrimination agency also deals with discrimination in public and publicly-assisted housing.

The thirteen state agencies having full enforcement powers have been given annual budgets totaling $1,366,226. This amounts to 2.21 cents for each person in these states. Of the total number of Negroes, other non-whites and Jews in the United States, 17.09% of the Negroes, 27.27% of the other non-whites and 73.37% of the Jews lived in these states. The recent total annual case load of the agencies stands at 2003.

Attached to this study are six appendices. Appendix I lists the laws of the fifteen states that are described below. Appendix II lists the names and addresses of the anti-discrimination agencies in each of the states. Appendix III contains four charts showing the salient features of the laws administered by the thirteen state anti-discrimination agencies that have effective enforcement powers. Appendix IV shows the total number of formal complaints received during a twelve-month period by the eleven agencies that have had enforcement powers for more than a year. Appendix V shows the amount and the per capita cost of the budget of each of the fifteen state agencies covered by this report. Appendix VI shows the number and proportion of Negroes, other non-whites, and Jews in the population of each of the states.

The Administrative Enforcement Process

The first two anti-discrimination agencies were established in 1945, when New York and New Jersey adopted fair employment laws. The administrative procedure established by those laws has been followed in virtually all of the statutes described below.

The laws define certain prohibited acts as "unfair," "improper," or "illegal" practices. A person aggrieved by a violation of the law may complain to the state agency established by the the law, which then conducts an investigation. If the complaint appears to be well founded, the agency attempts to settle the matter by conciliation. If that fails, a formal hearing is held and the agency issues a decision either dismissing the complaint or directing the violator to comply with a detailed order. The agency's order can then be reviewed by a state court. If the court finds that the agency's order is proper, it decrees compliance. Thereafter, violation of the order may be punished as contempt of court.

While all these agencies operate under this general administrative procedure, a few significant differences may be mentioned. The details appear in Tables A and B of Appendix III.

A proceeding may be initiated before any of the agencies by the filing of a complaint by a person who believes he has encountered discrimination. In addition, in eight of the states (all but Michigan, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York and Oregon), the Commission itself may initiate proceedings without waiting for an aggrieved party to act. Finally, in eight states (all but Connecticut, Michigan, Minnesota, Rhode Island and Washington), proceedings can be started by the state Attorney General or other public official.

In most of the states, no provision is made to allow a person who has filed a complaint to appeal to the courts if the agency decides that his complaint is without merit. In four states, however (Michigan, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Washington), such appeals are expressly allowed.

Employment

Table C of Appendix III shows the extent to which the thirteen agencies having enforcement powers deal with the areas of employment, education, public accommodations and housing. The history of the adoption of the laws in each of these areas may be described briefly.

As already noted, New York and New Jersey adopted the first fair employment laws in 1945. Additional fair employment laws were thereafter enacted in Massachusetts in 1946, Connecticut in 1947, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island and Washington in 1949, and Michigan, Minnesota and Pennsylvania in 1955.

"Voluntary" fair employment laws were adopted in 1945 by Indiana and Wisconsin. These laws condemned discrimination in employment without making it illegal. Each also established a state agency to attempt to bring about compliance. The Indiana law has never been strengthened to provide enforcement features. The Wisconsin law, however, was amended in 1957 to provide that orders of the agency administering the law could be enforced by appropriate court proceedings. Colorado adopted an extremely limited fair employment law in 1951 which, for the ordinary private employer, was in essence a "voluntary" law. It replaced that law in 1957 with a fully operative law modelled on those of the other states. In 1953, Kansas adopted a "voluntary" fair employment law and established a commission to attempt to bring about voluntary compliance.

Places of Public Accommodation

In 1949, a new trend was started in New Jersey. At that time New Jersey was one of a number of states having laws prohibiting discrimination in places of public accommodation. (Twenty-five states now have such laws, many of them having been in effect for fifty years or more.) The criminal and civil sanctions provided by these laws had proved relatively ineffective. Recognizing this, the New Jersey legislature decided to improve on the older procedure by applying the administrative process that had proven its merits under the 1945 fair employment law. Accordingly, it broadened the jurisdiction of its anti-discrimination agency to include public accommodations. The precedent thus set was thereafter followed by Connecticut, also in 1949, Massachusetts in 1950, New York and Rhode Island in 1952, and Colorado, Oregon and Washington in 1957.

Education

In 1948, New York enacted a fair educational practices act, providing administrative procedures to prevent discrimination by colleges and universities. Enforcement was entrusted not to the existing anti-discrimination agency but to the Department of Education, where it remains today. In New Jersey, however, the 1949 law just mentioned, giving the anti-discrimination agency power to prevent discrimination in public accommodations, also brought under the act discrimination by educational institutions. Massachusetts, which adopted a fair educational practices act in 1949, transferred enforcement powers to its general anti-discrimination agency in 1956. Washington's 1957 law empowering its anti-discrimination agency to enforce the law against discrimination in public accommodations included educational institutions within the definition of that term. Also in 1957, Oregon gave its agency jurisdiction over its existing law prohibiting discrimination in trade, professional and vocational schools.

Housing

Seven anti-discrimination agencies have been given jurisdiction to enforce existing or new laws against discrimination in one or more category of public or publicly-assisted housing. The first such grant occurred in 1949 when the Connecticut agency received responsibility for preventing discrimination in publicly-owned housing. Gradually, this and other state agencies were given jurisdiction over a number of categories of public and publicly-assisted housing so that, today, a total of seven agencies have such powers. Five of these, in Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York and Rhode Island, have jurisdiction over public housing. The first four also have jurisdiction over redevelopment housing and other housing receiving substantial assistance from the government, for example, in the form of tax exemption and assembling of land through the power of condemnation. The Oregon agency has jurisdiction specifically over projects on land assembled by condemnation. Most important, six agencies, in Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Oregon and Washington, have jurisdiction over housing built with the assistance of loans guaranteed by the FHA, Veterans Administration or other government agency.

Prohibited Conduct

Table D of Appendix III shows in detail the kind of discriminatory conduct that the various statutes prohibit. It should be noted at the outset that all of the laws contain provisions recognizing the right of religious institutions to consider the factor of religion in their selections, whether of employees, students or others. This is done in a number of ways. In some laws, there is a broad exemption for non-profit enterprises. Others, while not exempting non-profit or religious institutions generally, provide that they may confine their selections to, or prefer, members of their own faith.

As Table D shows, all thirteen states having enforceable laws prohibit discrimination by employers and labor unions. Similar effective prohibitions of discrimination in education, public accommodation and publicly-assisted housing are contained in each of the acts that deal with these subjects.

Virtually all of the states prohibit both inquiries and advertising indicating an intent to engage in employment discrimination. Similar clauses appear in many of the laws prohibiting discrimination in education, public accommodations and publicly-assisted housing. The laws also contain a number of general provisions making it illegal to discriminate against those who participate in statutory proceedings, to aid or abet discrimination and to obstruct compliance with the law.

The Case Load

Appendix IV shows that the eleven agencies that have had effective enforcement powers for at least a year have carried an aggregate annual case-load of 2,003 formal complaints. On a population basis, this represents a little over three and a half complaints per 100,000 in the population. The figures range from .89 for Minnesota, which delegates some of its work to municipal commissions in the state, to 9.86 in Connecticut. The variation is due, to some extent, to the varying scope of the agencies' responsibilities. Some, like Minnesota, deal only with employment while others, like Connecticut, have broad powers over a number of areas. (See Appendix III, Table C.)

The Cost to the People

The budgets and per capita costs of the agencies in each of the fifteen states are set forth in Appendix V. In the thirteen states having enforceable laws, the current budgets total $1,366,226 and the per capita annual cost to the 61,767,000 people in those states is 2.21 cents. The per capita cost varies greatly from state to state, ranging from 4.53 cents in Rhode Island to .25 cents in New Mexico. Like the complaint load figures just mentioned, this variation is partly due to differences in the agencies' responsibilities. Nevertheless, among agencies dealing only with employment, the range is from 1.84 cents in Michigan to .25 cents in New Mexico. Among agencies having had comprehensive powers for at least a year, the range is from 4.53 cents in Rhode Island to 1.81 in Massachusetts.

The Population Affected

Population figures for the fifteen states covered by this report appear in Appendix VI. The thirteen states having enforceable laws contain 37.39% of the total population of the United States, 17.09% of the Negroes and 27.27% of the other non-whites. There are no census figures for the Jewish population. Using widely accepted estimates, however, it appears that the Jews in these thirteen states constitute 73.37% of the total number of Jews in the country.

The successful operation of these laws over a period of twelve years is a convincing refutation of earlier fears that such legislation would promote rather than allay intergroup differences. The laws and the work of the agencies they establish have resulted in substantial advances toward the democratic goal of full equality for all Americans, without regard to race, religion or national origin.

NOTES TO APPENDIX III

1. Any person aggrieved "or any associate or person on his behalf."

2. The statute provides that "the Commission may receive and investigate complaints" but does not indicate who may be a complainant.

3. The Attorney-General is authorized to initiate complaints in employment cases but not in public accommodations cases.

4. The Attorney-General is authorized to initiate complaints in employment, public accommodations and publicly-assisted housing cases but not in education cases.

5. Complaint may be made by "an organization chartered for the purpose of combating discrimination or racism, or of safeguarding civil liberties, or of promoting full, free, or equal employment opportunities."

6. If the Commission is unable to eliminate an unfair employment practice, it notifies the governor, who appoints a board of review, which has power to issue an order enforceable in the courts.

7. The statute provides that "an order of the Commissioner may be enforced by proceedings in the County Court...." but does not indicate who is to institute the proceedings.

8. The statute provides: "The complainant, the Attorney-General or the Commission may secure enforcement of the order of the Commission...."

9. The statute provides: "Any person aggrieved by non-compliance with the order shall be entitled to have the same enforced specifically by suit in equity."

10. Numeral under each state indicates minimum number of employees necessary for application of law.

11. Educational institutions are included in the definition of public accommodations.

12. Discrimination in educational institutions is banned by the New York Education Law, which is enforced by the Commissioner of Education and the Board of Regents under a procedure similar to that followed by the state's Commission Against Discrimination. Institutions of higher learning and business and trade schools are covered by this law.

13. Applies only to vocational, professional, and trade schools.

14. Wisconsin's statute is basically a fair employment practices law but it also prohibits discrimination "in the fields of housing, recreation, education, health, and social welfare." It is not clear whether this prohibition is enforceable.

15. The list of places covered under this term varies from state to state.

16. "Public housing projects and all other forms of publicly-assisted housing" are included in the definition of public accommodations.

17. Limited to land condemned and assembled by a state agency.

18. Applies to multiple dwellings containing three or more apartments and housing projects containing ten or more homes.

19. Applies to all such housing.

20. Applies to multiple dwellings containing five or more apartments and housing projects containing six or more homes.

21. The chart shows only acts specifically prohibited by the various statutes. In other cases, the statutes may effectively prohibit specific conduct by the necessary interpretation of their terms.

22. In all cases, the conduct is prohibited if committed on the basis of "race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry" or an equivalent formula. All the laws contain provisions either permitting religious bodies to prefer their coreligionists or exempting them altogether.

23. Discrimination is banned, but only "if the individual is the best able and most competent to perform the services required."

24. For scope of application to public and publicly assisted housing, see Table C.

25. Applies also to discrimination by lending institutions in financing publicly assisted housing and to discriminatory inquiries in connection therewith.

26. Includes prohibition of discriminatory inquiries in connection with application for employee's surety bond.

27. Discriminatory questions by educational institutions are also covered since such institutions are included in the definition of public accommodations.

28. Attempts to aid, incite or compel others to violate the statute are banned but there is no specific prohibition of attempts to violate the statute itself.

(1) In comparing the number of complaints filed in the various states, it must be remembered that some agencies have much broader responsibility than others. See Appendix III, Table C.

(2) Colorado and Wisconsin are not included because the agencies in those states have not had effective enforcement powers for a full twelve-month period.

(3) The Minnesota figure does not include complaints arising in Minneapolis and St. Paul, due to an arrangement between the Minnesota Commission and the municipal fair employment agencies in those two cities, which have continued to operate after enactment of the state law.

(4) Washington's complaint figure is for the calendar year of 1956. It received 74 complaints between January 1 and November 25, 1957. The increase apparently reflects the fact that its powers have enlarged during 1957.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

We have been referred to you by the NAACP with our request for the declaration by 74 Protestant clergymen in Atlanta calling for comliance with the law, preservation of the public schools, freedom of speech and the reopening of communications between the races, excerpts of which were printed in the New York Herald Tribune of November 3, 1957.

At the same time we would like to know whether it is possible, through your office, to obtain copies of the minutes of the Meeting of the Southern Interagency of the Consultative Conference on Desegregation, which was held in Atlanta from November 5-6, 1957. We checked first with Mr. Arnold Aronson of the NCRAC here in New York. He was unable to help us but thought that we might obtain this material through your office.

Many thanks for your help.

Sincerely,

Rachel Lipsky

Dear Mrs. Polier:

Thank you for sending me a copy of the excellent report by the American Jewish Congress entitled: "The Myths of Racial Integration." It is a much needed refutation of the irrational fears concerning race and housing. While it is perhaps more timely in terms of developments in the North and West than in the South, I wonder if it would be possible for me to secure a small number of additional copies for selective distribution. Fifteen to twenty-five (15 - 25) copies would meet the immediate needs that I have in mind.

If you have not already done so, I might suggest that copies also be made available to the Consultative Conference on Desegregation for distribution to its mailing list. In this way, the report would reach the main private agencies concerned with racial discrimination.

We are indebted to the American Jewish Congress for the sound information and analyses that it makes available to those of us in the human relations field.

Sincerely,

Harold C. Fleming

Mr. Harold C. Fleming, Director

Dear Mr. Fleming:

During the past several months the American Jewish Congress has begun conducting among its members an educational program on integration--designed to explore the fears and myths that influence the attitudes and behavior of its members concerning relations with Negroes and Puerto Ricans. We are convinced that racial integration will be achieved in our time not exclusively through the enactment and enforcement of laws but also through the understanding of the irrational fears that influence human conduct.

As a first step in this educational program we prepared the enclosed "Myths of Racial Integration" in which we have attempted to answer some of the doubts and fears that trouble our members in discussions on integration. This has been circulated among them and is being used as a basis of group discussions and study group meetings.

We thought you might be interested in receiving a copy. Your comments would be deeply appreciated.

Cordially,

Justine Wise Polier

THE MYTHS OF RACIAL INTEGRATION

MYTH 1: PROPERTY VALUES GO DOWN WHEN NEGROES MOVE INTO A PREVIOUSLY RESTRICTED NEIGHBORHOOD.

FACTS: Of all the myths that have grown up concerning racial integration, none is more general nor more firmly established than the fear that if minority groups move into a neighborhood property values will immediately decline. Yet, every scientific analysis of this problem, whether done by government officials, housing experts or even by real estate appraisers, flatly denies this conclusion. These experts prove that while in some cases property values "may appear to decline" this is a temporary situation caused by "fear and unloading of homes by old time residents" - and is not due to the moving in of a member of a minority group. "It is the mass exodus that temporarily gluts the market with offerings that depress prices - not the influx of the minority groups. It is like a bank run engendered by fears. The fears produce an unwarranted condition avoided if people would stay put."1/ - so concludes the Society of Residential Appraisers. In this same analysis it is pointed out that even in areas where panic selling occurs..." after the first hysterical selling phase passes prices become stabilized then gradually increase under pressure of Negro bidding..... It is usually found that sales activity is greater in racially mixed areas especially in low and moderate price ranges and that the high effective demand among Negro buyers not only sustains price levels but often increases them."2/

There are many other studies that substantiate this conclusion. For example, a San Francisco study in 1951 3/ compared the property value of homes in a group of test areas into which non-whites had moved with a comparable group of restricted white areas-and concluded that "the prices in the neighborhoods undergoing racial change did not fall; in fact in some cases they rose." The author summarizes his data as follows:

> "The bulk of all sales in the test areas /areas into which non-whites had moved/ brought prices slightly above those in the white control areas ...whether these sales were to whites or non-whites...
> "About 9 per cent of the sales to white buyers took place at prices which were between 12 and 22 per cent lower than those for comparable properties in control areas /areas where Negroes had bought homes/, whereas no sales to non-whites fell in this range.

2/ Article cited above, pp. 8-9.

3/ Luigi M. Laurenti, "Effects of Non-White Purchases on Market Prices of Residences," The Appraisal Journal, July, 1952.

"About 4 per cent of the sales of non-white buyers took place at prices which were between 22 and 26 per cent higher than those for comparable properties in control areas, whereas no sales to whites fell in this range.

"These results do not show that any deterioration in market prices occurred following changes in the racial pattern."

A study on home buying in a section of Baltimore comes to the same conclusion:

"In other words, these homes are now being sold to Negroes for as much as 150 per cent above the 1940 market value, and at least 75 per cent above the present market value. Real estate operators readily admit that they are buying homes now occupied by whites as rapidly as they become vacant to sell to Negro buyers at a much greater profit than they could obtain elsewhere."4/

The experience of public housing authorities that have a mixed occupancy policy also discredits the myth that the value of property falls when minority groups move in. Charles Abrams, one of the nation's leading housing experts in discussing this problem writes:

"Negroes have been placed in the new projects in substantial numbers. Often there was no Negro occupancy whatever before construction of the project, yet values in the surrounding areas tended to rise after project occupancy. General Thomas F. Farrell, then chairman of the New York City Housing Authority, commented: 'There has been no tendency for neighborhood people to move away because of the projects...business in the neighborhood improves.'" 5/

This is supported in a study by the New York City Housing Authority on the effect of mixed projects on surrounding values. The projects studied included one in a densely occupied area and another on sparsely occupied land, surrounded mainly by one and two family houses. The Housing Authority concludes:

"In the instance of both types of projects, we found a definite increase in assessed valuations for a depth of about two blocks surrounding the project. The effect was most marked within a depth of one block surrounding the project where a good number of commercial establishments either had been opened or expanded because of the population introduced by the public housing project.

"The increase in valuation was smaller in the second block and there was no change in the area beyond it. From observation, the same effects were noted in projects built on vacant land, and a Research Committee of the National Association of Housing Officials found that 'the experience in New York City, as shown in the few studies we had made, had been duplicated in studies conducted in other cities.'"6/

In Portland, Oregon, a study of price fluctuations around a public housing project of 400 units in which there were 20 non-white families, showed increases in the surrounding areas of from 45 to 96 percent. Building activity spurted around the racially integrated Tasker Homes in Philadelphia, and within a few years 200 houses representing more than $1 million of new investment had been built in the adjoining section. In Atlanta, Georgia, the monthly rate of private constuction in the vicinity of a Negro housing project showed a gain of 500 per cent, or eight times the gain for the city as a whole. Numerous other authorities from various cities confirm these findings. The land around Parkway Village in Jamaica, N. Y., trebled in value after this mixed project for United Nations personnel was built by 15 New York City savings banks.7/

It may be concluded, therefore, that property values will not go down if a Negro moves into a restricted area; that only panic selling or a wholesale withdrawal of white residents will lower prices by flooding the market with sale offerings; that this panic selling, not the infiltration of the Negro, disturbs the dictates of supply and demand; and that even the temporary falling-off caused by a panic market will gradually stabilize itself and the prices of homes in interracial areas will become firm and their property value assured.

In short, panic selling, not racial integration in housing causes a decline in property values. An intelligent community that understands this issue--that will not be panicked or misled by fear or hysteria--has nothing to fear economically from integration in housing.

MYTH 2: IF ONE NEGRO MOVES INTO A NEIGHBORHOOD, A MULTITUDE WILL FOLLOW.

FACTS: If residents behave normally and "stay put," the neighborhood will not change radically. If one lives in a neighborhood one loves, why move?

It is unfortunately true, however, that many real estate men, because of the high prices they can get in selling to Negroes, often try to urge white persons to move. Sometimes they actually encourage fears and deliberately promote hysteria and panic selling. Some real estate agents have been known to call home owners individually, after one minority group family has moved in, and urge them to sell "before the bottom drops out of the market." Repeated calls are made in which the property value myth and the undesirability of living with such families are stressed. Negro agents have frequently been hired to visit homes, offering to buy and displaying large sums of money. Negro families have been employed to inquire about sales or even to wheel baby carriages back and forth on the block. Only a little more subtle was the agent who, whenever he sold a home in a neighborhood occupied exclusively by non-Jews to a family with an obviously Jewish name, sent postcards to the other residents reading somewhat as follows:

> "Dear Neighbor: We have just sold a house at 1522 Blank Street to Mr. Joseph Cohen. We hope you will get acquainted with your neighbor. FOR BEST RESULTS AND HIGHEST PRICES IN SELLING YOUR PROPERTY CALL CHROME REALTY, UN 9-9999."8/

"Plainly, these tactics are not resorted to out of love for the human race. The immediate effect is to promote a large number of sales, which will inevitably be made at reduced prices."9/

Many groups have successfully resisted such pressures. In a block in a previously all-white neighborhood near the edge of Philadelphia, old residents met the harassment of real estate men by putting signs in their windows saying, THIS HOUSE IS NOT FOR SALE. Those who wished to start panic selling, in the hope of buying houses cheaply and reselling them at a higher price, were not welcome with their message of fear. This is the type of neighborhood which will keep its values--economic and moral--and in the process will gain some excellent new citizens.

It is important to remember, too, that if there were a "free housing market" for Negroes in the United States today--there would be no reason to fear the myth of invasion. The Negroes represent less than five percent of the total population in the North today. If they were not restricted in the choice of their homes to a few ghetto areas--they could easily disperse throughout the country and there would be little reason to fear that they might invade any single community.

8/ Guide to Changing Neighborhoods, a manual on intergroup relations problems in neighborhoods undergoing change. Published by the NCRAC, 1956, p. 38.

9/ Guide to Changing Neighborhoods, cited above, p. 38.

Even in today's segregated housing market, moreover, the chances of Negroes "invading en masse" suburban areas are highly unlikely. Despite the increased earning capacity of Negroes today, only a tiny fraction can economically afford homes in suburban communities. There are relatively few Negroes moreover - even economically affluent Negroes - that are ready today to move into a strange and hostile white community and expose their children to the difficulties of adjusting in such a community. "Like all people, he [the Negro] usually wants to move when and where he finds himself welcome. He will not gamble on embarrassing his family or risking his investment in an area where he knows he will be unwelcome or his wife and children feel discomforted."10/ The fear therefore that vast numbers of Negroes will "invade en masse" any given white community - ignores completely the normal reluctance of people to leave the security of their "own group" and face hostile strangers.

MYTH 3: NEGROES DO NOT MAINTAIN THEIR PROPERTY.

FACTS: The best way of disproving this myth is to look at those areas or housing developments that have been integrated, such as Germantown, Pennsylvania (a wealthy suburban community); Queensview Houses (a non-profit cooperative in Queens, New York); Parkway Village, New York (an interracial development primarily for UN personnel); Windermere Place, St. Louis (a street of large and comfortable homes in what was once the most fashionable section of St. Louis); Concord Park, Pennsylvania (an interracial housing development of 139 homes in the $12,000-$16,000 class); to mention just a few. In all of these areas the minority group families have kept up their property as well as or better than the old-time residents.11/ The Philadelphia Human Relations Commission in discussing this problem states: "Our most important evidence that Negro home owners keep up their property well is right here in Germantown. We can think of many blocks where Negro home owners have kept up their properties far better than the previous white owners." 12/

Another basic way to explode this myth is to realize that it is based on "stereotype thinking"--thinking that considers Negro occupancy as exclusively "slum occupancy" and believes that the Negro has produced the economically-depressed areas, the deteriorated houses and the congested filthy streets that characterize many of the crowded Negro ghettoes in the slum sections of our cities. Those who are prone to such thinking fail to recognize that these slum conditions were not caused by the Negro but rather by the failure of landlords in slum areas to make repairs on deteriorated houses, and the failure of the city to enforce its own housing and sanitary regulations to prevent the overcrowding and filth that accumulate in these areas. Usually it is the "advancing age of the structure coupled with lack of maintenance by indifferent or greedy absentee owners who know it is not necessary to maintain the properties to hold tenants who have no other place to go that is the primary cause of slum conditions--not the dwellers. Whites observing Negroes living under these conditions are prone to blame the Negroes for it--whereas the Negro is the victim not the cause."13/

10/ Forbidden Neighbors, cited above, p. 275.

11/ They Say, That You Say, published by the American Friends Committee, p. 9

12/ They Say, That You Say, cited above, p. 9

Where the Negro has been given the opportunity to live in decent well-kept housing projects, it has been observed frequently by housing experts that "the housing projects inhabited by Negroes are in fact outstanding for their neatness and spruceness."14/

Negores, moreover, who move into suburban communities are as determined as their white neighbors to "keep up" their homes and neighborhood. They, too, have a "property interest" and have as much or more to gain by protecting the value of their investment. If they can afford the price of a suburban home, moreover, they are generally of the same or higher economic class (professional or white collar) as the other residents of their community--and as such have acquired the same "value standards" that generally belong to each class in our economic structure. To visualize all Negroes as "maids, bootblacks and porters"--enjoying the filth of the slums and incapable of keeping their own homes clean (there is no question that they can keep the homes of white employers clean)--is to fall prey to the worst kind of stereotyped thinking.

MYTH 4: NEGROES WILL NOT BE ABLE TO PAY FOR THEIR HOMES OR KEEP UP THEIR MORTGAGES AND WILL BE FORCED TO SELL THEIR HOMES AT LOWER PRICES TO A POORER CLASS OF PEOPLE. THIS WILL EVENTUALLY LOWER THE ECONOMIC STANDING OF THE COMMUNITY.

FACTS: Census figures show that the non-white population is steadily advancing to better paid occupations and to greater security in jobs, as well as to higher educational levels. More Negroes are going through high school, college and professional schools; and more Negroes are entering the professions and white collar jobs. Their salary levels are increasing and as a group they are classified today as "good credit risks."15/

13/ Values in Transition Areas, cited above, p. 6.

14/ Forbidden Neighbors, cited above, p. 268.

15/ They Say, That You Say, cited above, p. 10.

Albert M. Cole, Housing and Home Finance Agency administrator, said, "Recent studies in a large number of our cities indicate a very substantial waiting market for Negro housing ranging from $40 to $90 in rents and from $6,500 to $15,000 for sales housing, with a fair number of minority families able to enter the luxury market."16/

Credit experience with Negro home buyers has been excellent. The president of one of Philadelphia's biggest mortgage companies has written, "Over the years a great segment of the Negro population has obtained the respect of lenders, simply and quietly, by paying their bills when due. Actually there is no difference in our delinquency records between white and Negro loans and we take pride in our below-average mortgage delinquency record."17/

Before a convention of the National Association of Home Builders in January, 1953, Frank Horne, director of the Commission on Intergroup Relations, New York City, (then of the Housing and Home Finance Agency) said: "According to the reports by lending institutions and surveys by the National Association of Real Estate Boards and the Federal Housing Administration, non-white families rate at least as well as credit risks and good maintainers of standards of private properties as other families of similar economic status."18/

MYTH 5: NEIGHBORHOODS SHOULD BE HOMOGENEOUS WITH THE RESIDENTS HAVING THE SAME CULTURAL AND EDUCATIONAL BACKGROUND.

FACTS: Educators and psychiatrists all agree that schools or neighborhoods with persons of the same racial, religious, ethnic or economic background are not good for children or for adults. A town of all bankers or all shopclerks or all middle income professionals--is similar to a "one-industry company town." People have little opportunity for cultural enrichment if they are not given an opportunity to meet people of different backgrounds and experience. Their horizons become narrow and limited by the narrowness of their experiences and associations. "A sprinkling of poor artists, frustrated poets plus a few good restaurants run by some foreigners with culinary talent, might be a tonic relief to a neighborhood of bank clerks and shopkeepers, though their intrusion might violate the concept of homogeneous neighborhoods."19/

Homogeneous neighborhoods, moreover, breed homogeneous schools. Educators are convinced that heterogeneous schools--schools in which children of all races, religions and ethnic backgrounds work, study and play--are far better for the education of a child. It is the purpose of education in a democracy to provide a child with an opportunity to associate with children of diverse backgrounds and permit him goals and aspirations not limited to those provided by his own immediate society and cultural environment. If a child never sees a Negro, a Jew, a Protestant or a Catholic, he will be more apt to develop erroneous ideas and unfounded fears in regard to these "mythical people" who do not belong in his real world. Similarly, if a child of upper middle class parents never meets or associates with "poor children" who know real economic poverty and hardship, he will obviously become limited in his understanding of the problems of our society. The best private schools attempts to reach out with scholarships and other inducements to attract children of all backgrounds so that the school might be truly representative of the American cultural scene.

MYTH 6: IF NEGROES ARE PERMITTED TO LIVE IN THE SAME AREAS AS WHITES AND GO TO THE SAME SCHOOLS, THERE WILL BE MORE INTERMARRIAGE.

FACTS: For the Jew, the problem of intermarriage has a special dimension. Jews want their children to marry within the Jewish faith so as to perpetuate the ideas of Judaism. The Jew recognizes that when he left the ghettoes of Europe he naturally exposed himself to the danger of intermarriage--both racial and religious intermarriage. Any time that people of different backgrounds are thrown together there is always this possibility of intermarriage. "Race mixture has been going on during the whole of recorded history. Mankind has always been and still is a mongrel lot."20/

But the Jew recognizes, too, that for him the best defense against such intermarriage is obviously not to confine people--either himself or the Negro--to the isolation of the ghetto. On the contrary, his only defense is to develop a love and respect for the Jewish heritage among his children so that assimilation--whether racial or religious--is unlikely to occur. In other words, an affirmative program of Jewish education--not the ghettoizing of racial or religious groups--is the only meaningful instrument of Jewish survival, and the only meaningful defense against intermarriage.

It is interesting to note, too, that the leading psychiatrists in the country today state unequivocally that no facts exist to prove that desegregation of the schools and the mixing of white and Negro children that occurs as a result, causes intermarriage per se.

The Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry (GAP), a group of distinguished social psychiatrists, has stated: "The expectation voiced by many people that school desegregation will result in a great rise in the rate of intermarriage seems to be an expression of their bias and fear, rather than a reliable prediction. As a matter of fact, the information on which to base predictions with regard to racial intermarriage is extremely sparse and rather confusing." 21/

The most authoritative current work on the subject of intermarriage, "Negro-White Intermarriage in Recent Times," by Wirth, Louis, Goldhamer and Herbert 22/ opens with the statement, "Only limited and unsatisfactory data are available on Negro-white intermarriage in the United States. The many factors that determine fluctuations in the rate of racial intermarriage are far from clear. In Boston, where legal school desegregation has been in effect for decades, there was a relatively high rate in the years immediately after 1900 and a marked decrease in the next decades despite a constant ratio of Negroes to the total population. In urban New York State, other than New York City, the ratio climbed between 1916 to 24 and then dropped steadily for the next ten years. No satisfactory explanation for this shift has been established. The facts conclude that legal school desegregation per se does not influence the rate of intermarriage in ways that are yet predictable."

Both the GAP report and the Wirth article point out that there are many complicated psychological and social factors that determine marital choice, and that for most people, similarity of social, religious and economic backgrounds is the determining factor in the choice of a mate. "Under the social conditions of today, such commonality between Negro and white is rare." It is unrealistic to conclude, therefore, that closer association in school and neighborhood will of itself provide the similarity of background, conducive to intermarriage.

MYTH 7: PRESTIGE WILL BE LOST IF NEGROES LIVE IN YOUR NEIGHBORHOOD.

FACTS: Basically, a neighborhood gains prestige from its appearance, from the stature of those who live in it and the quality of its community life. A man's stature is earned by his professional standing, his economic level, his leadership in civic activities--not from the color of his skin. When Ralph Bunche moved into Cambridge, Massachusetts, no one doubted that the prestige of the town had been increased, rather than decreased.

Those people fearing loss of status because of the influx of the Negro are confusing "cause and effect." They see social deterioration and decline in many areas where the Negro lives; and incorrectly blame the Negro for this social decline and loss of neighborhood prestige. They then conclude that the purchase of a home by any Negro, even an economically affluent Negro, will cause the same decline in their own neighborhood. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Negro who is in a position economically to purchase a home in the suburbs is of a class that will not threaten a community's status or prestige. His professional standing, his economic achievement level, and his intellectual achievements--will generally equal or surpass those of his white neighbors.

MYTH 8: NEGRO CHILDREN ARE INNATELY LESS INTELLIGENT THAN WHITE CHILDREN. INTEGRATED SCHOOLS, THEREFORE, WILL RESULT IN LOWER EDUCATIONAL STANDARDS AND WILL HOLD BACK THE INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF WHITE CHILDREN.

FACTS: First, the assumption that there are innate differences in intellectual potential between Negroes and whites is flatly denied by social and psychological tests.23/ It is, however, recognized that there are differences in the educational motivation and aspiration and the levels of educational attainment--between Negro and white children. Eighty years of discrimination and segregation must of necessity affect the learning capacities and motivation of a people. Culturally and economically deprived families (whether they are white or Negro) are characteristically low in social morale and in incentive to learn, to develop individual potentials, to aspire and to "become." These important considerations, not the allegedly "innate intellectual inferiority" of the Negro, are acknowledged by all responsible educators and psychologists, and it would be dishonest to avoid them in any realistic discussion of the problems that integration in education creates. It is for these reasons, however, that all carefully planned programs for school integration, in cities in which large numbers of Negro children live, anticipate and prepare for reducing the gap that is likely to exist between Negro and white children. Smaller classes, improved facilities, more experienced teachers, revised recruitment policies, remedial work, more extensive guidance and motivation resources, special classes for gifted children, special classes for children with language difficulties, enriched curricula--all of these must be part of a good integration program. Thus conceived, a real integration program becomes indistinguishable from the general effort to advance the goals and promise of public education.

If one examines the program for integration proposed by the New York City Integration Commission, one will see that such a program includes not only integrating the schools but providing better and more experienced teachers in the schools in which such integration will take place; it includes more extensive psychological care in public schools so that special help can be given to those children that need it. Classes for gifted children will be created so that no gifted child will be held back in his intellectual development. In addition, the Integration Commission has asked for severl million dollars to build new schools, improve the old buildings and generally improve the physical condition of the schools. In the long run, therefore, such an integration program will improve educational standards for all children.

23/ "Social and Psychological Factors in Integration," published in The Journal of Educational Sociology, Oct. 1957, p. 61.

In suburban communities the fear that permitting a few Negro children into the schools will lower the standards of the schools is completely fallacious. The children of Negro families economically able to afford suburban homes generally have the same aspirations and motivations as white children. They do not suffer from the limited educational horizons of children from economically depressed areas.

There is still another dimension to the problem of integration in education--a moral dimension that one cannot ignore in discussing this problem. It should be clear that the level of educational attainment in a segregated public school cannot be equal to that which prevails in an integrated school. Even if such a school were equal in the physical facilities it provides--the mere fact of "segregation" imposes physical hardships upon the minority children--a hardship that seriously retards educational motivation and achievement. It is morally indefensible, therefore, to demand the best educational facilities for the white children and at the same time to ignore and remain indifferent to the damage we are inflicting on Negro children by confining them to ghettoized schools. It is this ghettoization in housing and in education which breeds and creates the maladjusted child, the delinquent and the criminal. The alternative to providing integrated schools therefore even at the risk of a temporary decline in the standards of a white school (a decline which as pointed out above need not ever happen) is to perpetuate a system of inferior education for a third of our citizens. This is a morally indefensible position that cannot be condoned.

MYTH 9: IF A NEGRO MOVES INTO A WHITE NEIGHBORHOOD THERE WILL BE INCREASED CRIME AND DELINQUENCY.

FACTS: In discussing this myth it is important to distinguish between the case of a few Negroes moving into a suburban community and the creation of "black--slum belts" in formerly all-white urban areas, (e.g., West Side of Manhattan, New York City). No one fears that crime and delinquency will result from the first situation; it is the second situation that produces this fear. This is, moreover, a justifiable fear. For, there can be no question but that slum conditions--crowded, filthy apartments, inadequate schools and recreational facilities, infested streets and congested dilapidated buildings and the inadequate home life they reflect go hand in hand with crime and delinquency. The Negro, denied educational opportunities, discriminated against in employment and forced to live in these slum belts--does have his share of criminals and delinquents. But, the way to protect a community against such crime and delinquency is not by running away from it but by attempting to eliminate it. As a practical matter, distance is never a deterrent against crime. What stops a criminal from traveling 2 miles, 5 miles, 20 miles or 100 miles to kill, to rob, or to molest a child? To keep the Negro locked in slum ghettoes subject to the social diseases which slums breed will certainly not provide protection for anyone--anywhere! Real protection lies in destroying this ghetto--in providing a fair housing market for the Negro so that he can choose better places in which to raise his children--in giving him better schools, more educational opportunities and a labor market that will accept him on merit alone.

Dear Fred:

I have your note of February 12, together with a clipping describing the midyear meeting of the American Bar Association in Atlanta, Georgia.

Of course, I agree with you that the ABA -- of all groups -- should not have met in a state which is so recklessly and boldly defying the Supreme Court decision. Unfortunately, nothing could have been done at this late date to prevent the meeting from being held in Georgia; I was not earlier aware that they were going to hold a meeting there because, normally, I do not keep abreast of ABA's affairs (I have never been a member of that group for good and sufficient reasons).

However, I do think that appropriate representations should be made to the governing Board of ABA so that in the future they will avoid embarrassing lawyers by meeting elsewhere in the South during the desegregation crisis. A studied refusal to meet in the South might help Southern lawyers come closer to a recognition of the meaning and significance of the "law of the land."

We shall try to have such representations made by some appropriate person.

I hope I shall see something of you soon. My warm regards.

Sincerely,

Edwin J. Lukas

February 28, 1958

Dear Friend:

As you are probably already aware, the American Jewish Congress has issued a statement in connection with the so-called Johns Committee investigation in Miami. The newspaper accounts did not carry the full text of the statement. So that you may be fully informed, the full statement is enclosed.

The issues are very clear. In issuing our statement we recognize the likelihood that some would charge we were making the hearings a "Jewish issue". On the other hand, we are also cognizant of the fact that the preservation of civil liberties and civil rights is the concern and responsibility of every American. It is our feeling the time is rapidly approaching, if it hasn't already arrived, to take a public stand.

If you have any comments or questions in regard to the statement issued, we would welcome them.

Sincerely,

STATEMENT BY SOUTH FLORIDA COUNCIL, AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

The American Jewish Congress, a national voluntary organization with some 300,000 direct and affiliated members, has always been unequivocally opposed to Communism, fascism and other forms of totalitarianism. We know only too well the debasing effects of Communism and the campaign of cultural genocide directed against Jews in the Soviet Union. Together with all Americans who prize the blessings of liberty, we have repeatedly affirmed our support of measures to resist Communist aggression. But we have also insisted that our nation's security is not enhanced by measures that violate the essential liberties whose preservation is the basic purpose of our Republic. We have particularly condemned measures ostensibly designed to uproot or expose Communist influence but in reality aimed at voluntary associations that have nothing in common with Communism.

We recognize that some legislative investigating committees can and do serve useful purposes in recommending legislation for the public welfare. But where investigating committees impinge upon the rights of the individual to hold private beliefs and to have free association there is a threat to our fundamental freedom. We are therefore impelled to issue this warning about the Florida Legislative Investigation Committee known as the Johns Committee, and the investigation it is presently conducting. The Johns Committee was purportedly created to investigate "the Communist party and other subversive organizations...seeking to agitate and engender ill-will between the races of this and other states...", but the hearings now conducted by the committee show that its real purpose is to "smear" any organization, no matter how patriotic or reputable, that in any way seeks to bring about orderly compliance with United States Supreme Court decisions.

The efforts of the Johns Committee to establish a link between the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Communist Party evinces a deliberate design to equate activities on behalf of desegregation with Communism. We deplore this attack on the NAACP, an organization about which J. Edgar Hoover said, "Equality, freedom and tolerance are essential in a Democratic government. The NAACP has done much to preserve these principles and to perpetuate the desires of our founding fathers." The Florida Legislative Investigation Committee's efforts to pillory and harass such reputable intergroup organizations as the Florida Human Relations Council and the Dade County Council on Community Relations equally merit censure.

The Johns Committee investigation is part of a systematic campaign to throttle voluntary associations and individuals, opposed to racial segregation, who wish to exercise their rights to speak freely about and to uphold the law of the land. The Johns Committee thus attacks one of the most fundamental guarantees of our Constitution: the right of freedom of association. We urge all Floridians committed to the doctrine of full equality in a free society to recognize the dangers inherent in this assault and to redouble their efforts to make such voluntary associations strong and effective.

The Johns Committee, in our considered opinion, is operating under a grant of powers so sweeping, so vague, and so ill-defined that it violates the constitutional standards for legislative investigating committees set forth by the United States Supreme Court only last June in the Watkins and Sweezy cases. We believe, as it is now evident, that the Johns Committee does not perform a useful function. Despite its pious protestations to the contrary, it is conducting a witchhunt which does a disservice to our state and its people. We urge our publicly elected legislators to end this unlawful and stubborn resistance to the supreme law of our land. We ask our fellow citizens to help in the return to the basic American principles of freedom of association, freedom of assembly and freedom of the individual.

Dear Gus:

Many thanks for your letter of 6th March with the enclosed confidential report of the February 17th meeting. This is an excellent job of reporting and helps keep the record straight.

Please let me know how the March 10th meeting comes out. I am interested too in the Rev. Estelle and the Negro delegation's meeting with the President of the School Board. What was the outcome of the meeting? I note on page four the report that the newspapers released the story of preventative police measures planned. Would you please send us a thermo-fax copy of the article?

I imagine by now you have received a copy of the letter I sent Ed Lukas. I trust you think it satisfactory.

Best regards.

Dear Haskell:

Thanks for your welcome letter. I am enclosing a list of those in attendance at the last interagency meeting, and also our directory of agencies active in the South. The latter is revised periodically and should be sent to you automatically in the future.

I found your comments on the bombing very interesting. My own feeling has been that the Miami bombing, in particular, was a manifestation of anti-semitism rather than anti-integration feeling. Your analysis certainly seems to bear this out. Let's hope the police investigation is more successful than it was last time.

I am glad we had a chance to get acquainted at the interagency meeting and am looking forward to a cooperative association in the future.

Dear Harold:

I've received the minutes of the Interagency meeting, for which my thanks. I notice that there was not a list of the names and addresses of the people who attended, which I would find helpful. Can you send me same?

You've probably been in touch with people in regard to the bombing which took place here last Sunday. While it well may have been done by the White Citizens Councils or KKK elements, I do not believe it was. There are many questions still unanswered, not the least of which---why the dynamiting occurred at Temple Beth El? That Temple is distinguished for its silence on social issues, particularly segregation. If it were a blow against the proponents of desegregation, there are at least two temples in town which would have been far better targets, and the point that this was an attack on desegregationists would have been made very clear. The fact that the dynamiting was not done in a manner to destroy the temple completely also puzzles me. Why was the dynamite placed outside instead of inside the building? Why was the school--auditorium part of the building the target instead of the synagogue proper?

Naturally, I can see reason for wanting to pin it on the White Citizens Councils and KKK people because they are the logical suspects, but I cannot concede that these are the facts as established by evidence of the moment. So far as I know the police have no tangible leads, and it may very well be we are in process of repeating the pattern of several years ago, where the bombings were never solved.

Sincerely yours,

Haskell

Dear Fred:

I have been consulting with several Negro leaders in Dallas on incidents of violence, intimidation and reprisals which have occurred since the school desegregation decision and the experiences of Negroes qualifying to vote and the acceptance of the rights of Negroes to vote in this area.

One of my conversations was with Mr. U. Simpson Tate, an attorney, who has represented NAACP in the South. He has a tremendous knowledge of the south and has represented the Negro in a score of legal cases. He is ready to cooperate with the Southern Regional Council in its survey.

I would, therefore, suggest that you write to him directly for information. We believe that the data would be more acurate by this procedure. His address is: 4211 South Oakland, Dallas 15, Texas.

You will note that I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Tate as well as to Maceo Smith.

Subject: Prospectus - Dallas Commission on Human Relations

I am addressing this memorandum to you since I shall need your assistance in an important development of the White-Negro Leadership Group which held its fourth meeting on Monday, May 5 at the First Unitarian Church from 9:00 A.M. to 11:00 A.M. Dean Cunniggin was convener for this session. Reports of previous meetings of this group on February 17, March 10 and 17, 1958, were sent to the office.

This meeting had a three-fold objective: 1). to discuss the various Clergy Integration Statements and their implementations; 2). to determine the future status of the White-Negro Leadership Group; and, 3). to explore the feasibility of the formation of a Dallas Commission on Human Relations. Following the customary procedure of other meetings, the discussion was held in executive session so no detailed minutes were taken.

This memorandum, therefore, is a summary of the principal items discussed without identification of the participants.

1. Clergy Integration Statements

During the past week, statements by the Protestant, Jewish and Negro Clergy groups were issued separately. The original intent was to prepare one statement but since the Protestant group constituted the largest and most important segment and also offered the greatest possible opposition to any statement, it was decided to concentrate on the Protestant Clergy with the hope that the final draft would be acceptable to the Jewish and Negro clergy. If not, each denomination promised to publish supplementary ones. It was also decided to release the statements for the Sunday morning editions which would assure equal coverage by both of the local papers.

Attached to this memorandum are copies of the three statements:

a. The Protestant statement released on Sunday, April 27 was signed by 301 clergymen, a remarkable and miraculous feat. Plans are now being made for its wide distribution in the Protestant Churches. Odds were against the final adoption of any statement and the large number of signers astonished even the most optomistic supporter, especially the acceptance of the 6th paragraph, to wit, "All of this leads us to the conviction that enforced segregation is morally and spiritually wrong, etc." While Dean Cuninggin should have the honors of this successful achievement, the Leadership Group acted as the motivating fulcrum in the process.

The affirmative response by the church members to the statement and the position of the signers far outweighed the critical reaction - an index to a healthy general attitude of the community toward the problem. The newspapers wrote commendatory editorials and gave prominent coverage to the statement. Lynn Landrum, reactionary columnist for the Dallas Morning News, was the only dissenting voice and even his criticism was milder than anticipated.

b. The statement by the rabbis on April 27 was also favorably received. An effort was made to remove the theological references in the Protestant one which would have made possible rabbinical acceptance, but, when a large number of Protestant ministers insisted on these references, which if omitted, would have alienated many signers, it was decided to have the rabbis issue a separate supplementary one.

c. The Negro statement was released on the following Sunday and was published by two newspapers. It was interesting to note that the statement reflected in many ways the discussions at our Leadership Group Meetings and indicated the impact of our group on the Negro members.

2. Future Status of Leadership Group

The future status of the White-Negro Leadership Group was discussed at great length. There was general feeling that it had served a constructive purpose and had offered the first opportunity for equal exchange of opinions and ideas among top leadership of both races. However, the group recommended that meetings should be held on a more formal basis and that broader aspects of the problem should be considered. While I had discussed such goals privately with the various members, it was gratifying to me when these views were vocalized and definite steps recommended to direct our attention to explore the feasibility of forming a Dallas Commission on Human Relations. Maceo Smith, a Negro leader, was appointed as Convener for the next meeting which would be devoted to this theme.

Attached is a reference to my efforts from my report of the Leadership Group on March 10 and 17 on this subject.

3. Dallas Commission on Human Relations

I was asked by the group to gather facts on existing Commissions on Human Relations or Mayor's Committees - their structure, operation, purposes, functions and program - and to report these findings at the next meeting. We are hoping that out of these discussions we shall be able to prepare a prospectus for a Dallas Commission on Human Relations which will be presented to the Mayor for implementation. It will be a long and slow process but I believe the result will warrant the effort.

I shall need your assistance in the preparation of this prospectus. Please send me material on the formation, structure and program of Mayor's or City Commissions on Human Relations. Also, your suggestion and advice which will assist me in the preparation of my report.

I have a two-fold job ahead: 1). to become thoroughly acquainted with existing commissions throughout the country, and 2). to prepare a model structure adapted to the needs of the Dallas community. This is an important task and together I am confident we will be able to evolve a workable plan acceptable to local needs.

I shall appreciate receiving reports, pamphlets, constitutions and by-laws, etc. which I promise to return when so requested. Your personal ideas, memoranda and suggestions can follow. Thanks.

DALLAS CLERGY SIGN INTEGRATION STATEMENT

Here is the full statement on desegregation released Saturday by white Protestant clergymen here, and the list of signers:

"Dallas, together with the rest of the nation, faces serious social issues which must be resolved. We, the undersigned ministers, here declare our conviction that racial problems and their solution are moral and spiritual as well as political matters, and that our understanding of the demands of God impels us to speak. God-fearing citizens cannot ignore their responsibilities in civil society. We speak as individuals only, not as representatives of any group or organization.

"We admit, in deep humility, our own sins of prejudice in many areas, and the failure of our religious bodies to solve problems of racial relationships.

"We recognize that there are honest differences of opinion among sincere people concerning desegregation in the public schools. One of the most prized possessions of a free society, however, is the right to discuss differences openly. We are certain that thoughtful citizens, although they may differ in their views on the race question, agree that these differences can be resolved only by following democratic principles, such as respect for the rights of individuals, free speech and due process of law through the courts, without recourse to violence and lawlessness.

"The only solution to this or any other problem of human relations lies in the application of the New Testament concept of Christian love in which we seek for others that which we desire for ourselves. We remember that Jesus said, "By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another." We remember that the Holy Spirit led Peter to say, "God has shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean."

"These Scriptures, among others, call us as Christians to go beyond simple justice to the practice of our Lord's commandments. We must treat every individual as a person made in the image of God and one for whom Christ died. This impels us to express our concern in the social and political situations of our times.

"All of this leads us to the conviction that enforced segregation is morally and spiritually wrong, and in light of these beliefs we present the following principles:

"1. These problems can be solved only as people seek God's help. We should seek not to justify our own views in His sight, but to obtain His guidance in all our actions. We urge that [illegible] law and order are maintained in Dallas.

"3. Churches, service clubs and community organizations, newspapers, radio and television have a responsibility to aid in the solution of this problem. We urge that these groups and enterprises join together in seeking actively to promote the spirit of harmony and peace among all people, both by aiding forces of order and good-will, and by discouraging destructive actions.

"4. The citizens of Dallas have a responsibility to assist the School Boards as they attempt to lead the community. In order that the School Boards may have the understanding support of the community in desegregating the public schools, we urge that plans be made public as soon as possible.

"5. Christian parents can be of great help in creating proper attitudes toward race. We urge that all parents, by conversation and example, set a pattern of responsible Christian citizenship in a democracy which recognizes justice, fair-play and respect for the sacredness of human personality.

"6. The exchange of views among people of different races is necessary for a reasonable solution to the problem. We urge that religious, civic and educational groups of all races seek to understand each other by a free interchange of ideas and opinions in order that there may be a full confidence and cooperation in arriving at solutions."

Text of Negro Pastors' Call To End Segregation Given

DALLAS MORNING NEWS 5/6/58

Over the weekend 115 Negro pastors issued a statement calling for an end to "Segregation and stratification." The statement follows:

Almost universally major Christian bodies, both Catholic and Protestant, have spoken in essential agreement upon the problems of racial integration. Jewish Rabbis have spoken similarly.

We, the ministers of Negro congregations in Dallas, have been too well aware of the blight and sinfulness of racial discrimination and forced segregation both within the church and society as a whole.

We, being faced constantly with our responsibility to minister to our own people, the victims of an embarrassing and frustrating dilemma, are moved to speak. We speak in behalf of a people who have tragically suffered from a practice that is in direct opposition to the principles that we teach. We speak in humbleness as servants of God to the larger community of Dallas. As we speak, we pray that God help us communicate to those who listen, to those who wrestle with feelings of guilt, and to those who creatively struggle with the problems of this day.

It is evident that in Dallas we live in the midst of frustration as a result of our failure to live up to what we know. Our only hope is to come to grips with our whole community and repent in terms of the acceptance of God's total will for our inclusive good.

Patiently, with love and Christian understanding, we have helped our people adjust their external behaviors to the evolution of laws related to the "race" structure. These segregation statutes and practices have been known to us as "legally" right, but sinful in the eyes of God (James 2:9 "But if you show partiality, you commit sin, and are convicted by the law as transgressors.")

While we heartily commend the creative efforts of many of our citizens in the whole area of social problems, we must publicly condemn segregation and stratification. It, we feel, is our task, shared by every true Christian, to seek to bring the power of the word of God to bear upon individuals, thereby changing their hearts and enriching their lives.

If we can speak for a people given to us to lead, a people who come to us with their problems and confidences, the following should be said:

HOW THE NEGRO THINKS

1. He loves Dallas as a city of progress and of even greater potential for the good.

2. He has waited years for the fulfillment of dreams yet to be realized. This has been a patient Christian type of suffering at a great cost to him and to his forebears. There is a Christian confidence that God has the Power in history and that God will not deny his own. The gains that have been made leading forward to true democracy and to greater love of one man for another must be preserved and strengthened.

3. He feels that the progress in making our American Democracy more real is inevitable. Desegregation is on the way and will come in no distant time. He subscribes wholeheartedly to the American Christian democratic way of life. His aspiration is to be a great contributor. He is confident that in Dallas, moral and spiritual forces will come to bear in implementing court decisions which are vital in fostering our democratic heritage.

4. He knows that God demands that both he and his brother of other races must mature to the responsibility for the society in which he lives.

5. He is aware that if he, his uninformed Negro or white brother continues to support the old status quo, then progress for Dallas will be seriously impeded.

6. He does not know all the answers, but is anxiously willing to be a part of the solution. He feels that the resolution of the problems of our present day society is hinged upon full representation of the citizenry at large.

7. He is concerned about the overly compensating treatment given his "National" and foreign brothers of color as compared to that given to him and his children.

8. His ideal is to be accepted as an American citizen on the basis of his individual worth.

WHAT THE NEGRO WANTS

1. No special privilege. Merely the rights of first class American citizenship in all aspects.

2. To be respected as a person—not a race. Christianity and democracy both teach this.

3. To live in a truly free society—to be released from the terrifically harsh effects of segregation—to live in an atmosphere where there is opportunity for mutual confession, understanding, forgiveness, and love for fellowmen.

4. Services rendered in his behalf, as should be true for all citizens, to be based upon deeper values than purely humanitarian philanthrophy and paternalism.

5. His differences to be neither ignored nor accentuated.

6. Unity in diversity. America is a diversified country. The Negro wants to be accepted in terms of his [illegible] as a part along with others in making America a strong cosmopolitan nation.

7. Unity on equal terms—not of superiors dominating over or condescending to inferiors.

8. The right to live and find free expression of his native endowment as an individual. This involves the whole realm of equality in political and economic rights, which include job opportunities, schooling, public conveniences, etc.

9. "To be a brother and not a brother-in-law." He wants to have a sense of belonging to a total citizenry.

10. Peace and harmony in an ordered society.

We have read and studied the statement by white clergymen of the Dallas area published in the newspapers on Sunday, April 27, 1958.

We concur wholeheartedly in this statement, without reservation. Further, we are grateful indeed for the forthright, courageous expression by these great leaders of Dallas' churchdom.

We here acknowledge appreciation for the other subsequent, supporting statements that are forthcoming.

We are requesting only simple justice, although it is realized that Christians should go beyond simple justice to actual practice of the Lord's commandments. We do not even ask for mercy. We ask for nothing that a recognition of the dignity of man does not prescribe. We want a sense of belonging. We want to do our full part in making Dallas a finer community for all citizens regardless of race, creed, or color.

We have attempted with all the power that God has vouchsafed unto us to teach to our own people, men, women, and children, the principles of decency and good citizenship. This we shall continue to do, and as the law of the land is implemented by duly constituted authorities in Dallas, our blessed community may be assured that we will do all possible, with God's help and the help of the total citizenry of Dallas, to see that no action be taken by our people that would exacerbate or inflame. We shall never take the law into our own hands, for we recognize that law and order in a free society must be our guide always and forever.

We feel truly confident because we know that God is with us.

Racial Mixing Plea Given by Negro Group

Pastors' Statement Lists Objections to Segregation

By BILL GLINES

Some 115 Dallas Negro pastors called for an end to "segregation and stratification" in a 3-page statement issued Saturday.

"The Negro wants no special privilege, merely the rights of first-class American citizenship in all aspects," stated the manifesto. "He wants to be respected as a person, not a race.

"He wants to live in a truly free society, to be released from the terrifically harsh effects of segregation, to live in an atmosphere where there is opportunity for mutual confession, understanding, forgiveness, and love for fellow man.

"He wants peace and harmony in an ordered society."

In addition, the statement endorsed "wholeheartedly" the stand taken last week by 300 white preachers which termed "enforced segregation spiritually and morally wrong."

The earlier statement was made at a press conference headed by Methodist Bishop William C. Martin, Episcopalian Bishop C. Avery Mason, Dr. John F. Anderson of First Presbyterian Church and Dr. Foy Valentine, director of the Christian Life Commission of the Baptist General Convention of Texas.

U.S. Dist. Judge William Atwell this month ordered that Dallas' 141 public schools be integrated, but fixed no deadline.

The statement by the Negro pastors reads in part:

"We, the ministers of Negro congregations in Dallas, have been too well aware of the blight and sinfulness of racial discrimination and forced segregation both within the church and society as a whole.

"We, being faced constantly with our responsibility to minister to our own people, the victims of an embarrassing and frustrating dilemma, are moved to speak . . . we speak in humbleness as servants of God to the larger community of Dallas.

"Our only hope is to come to grips with our whole community and repent in terms of God's total will be for our inclusive good.

". . . The Negro loves Dallas as a city of progress and of even greater potential for the good. He has waited years for the fulfillment of dreams not yet realized. This has been a patient Christian type of suffering at a great cost to him and his forebears.

"He subscribes wholeheartedly to the American Christian democratic way of life. His aspiration is to be a great contributor . . . his ideal is to be accepted as an American citizen on the basis of his individual worth."

The portion touching on the statement by white pastors read as follows:

"We concur wholeheartedly in the statement, without reservation. Further, we are grateful for the forthright, courageous expression by these great leaders of Dallas' churchdom."

The statement was released to the press by the Rev. Paul A. Sims.

Signatures represent leaders of the following faiths: Baptist, Primitive; Baptist, Missionary; Baptist, National; Church of the Living God; Church of Christ; Christian (Disciples of Christ); Methodist; Methodist, AME and Methodist, CME.

Five Rabbis Join Plea of 300 Pastors

The five Dallas rabbis registered their approval Monday of the integration statement issued Saturday by 300 Dallas Protestant ministers.

Rejoicing in the "moral and spiritual affirmation" announced by Dallas Protestant clergy, the Jewish leaders said it was their prayer that the city "will move wisely and morally and spiritually toward the orderly fulfillment of the law."

Their statement in full:

"As rabbis who teach the faith convenanted by our fathers with God, we rejoice in the moral and spiritual affirmation announced by the Protestant clergy of our city in the matter of integration. Drawing upon the noblest of our Jewish tradition we would associate ourselves with the spirit of their declaration, and, as we have always asked of our own followers, call upon peoples of all faiths to help fulfil the hope of the ages —the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man.

"We re-afform the words of our Bible which announces that man is made in the image of God. In this sense, we are all children of the one living God, and must learn to live in love and respect, one with the other.

"So long as we divide ourselves where God has intended for us to unite and love each other, we are in sin. We would translate the ideals of our faith into the community of God, and help establish His kingdom among men.

"The Supreme Court of our country has spelled out in law what the prophets of our faith declared long ago. It is our prayer that the citizens of Dallas, inspired by their faith in God, will move wisely, and morally, and spiritually toward the orderly fulfillment of the law. May God lead and bless the work of our hands.

"All five rabbis residing in Dallas have authorized the use of their names in the issuance of this statement."

Rabbi Jonathan Abramowitz
Rabbi Pierce Annes
Rabbi Gerald J. Klein
Rabbi Levi A. Olan
Rabbi Hillel E. Silverman

There was consensus that this group had made a definite contribution to the betterment of the community, and that meetings should be continued, though not on a regular basis. It was also pointed out that this informal activity had provided and reestablished channels of communication between the Negro and white leadership which, unfortunately, had deteriorated during the past two years. Involving the Negro leaders in the formative process, making them a part of the development on an equal basis has, to my mind, restored their confidence in the sincerity of white persons interested in the orderly process of law. The group decided that the conference with Dr. Rippy marked the first step, and that additional persons should be included on a limited basis and selected on the importance and influence of their respective fields, i. e., labor, business, civic, etc. In the interim period before the next meeting, I shall contact several of the members for this purpose.

4. Addendum

While not discussed at the meetings, I believe the following should be noted:

In my private exchange of views and ideas with the members, particularly, the Negroes, we considered the implications of the integration problem. Desegregation constituted the most acute and dramatic aspects of the broader phases, such as housing discrimination, employment discrimination, public accommodation, etc. We are envisaging the time when the present group will step beyond the limits of desegregation and begin to tackle the broader phases. We are also setting our sights on the possibility of the creation of a Dallas Commission on Human Relations. But this is a far distant goal, but not an unattainable one toward "equality based on merit" - the actuation of the American, democratic process.

I have initiated, also, preliminary discussions with SMU leaders on the possibility of utilizing their post-graduate students for the purpose of gathering factual material on the various phases to do field work in the furtherance of these goals. AJC Dallas office secretarial service has been made available in this project.

However, my schedule is limited - the area is large and functional and administrative demands are excessive - so much so that I cannot devote the professional time to the furtherance of this program. Perhaps, you may have suggestions, especially after reading your recent report on The Committee on the South.

On March 13, I met with William Campbell, of the National Council of Churches (Nashville), during his visit to Dallas, and Roy Valentine, Secretary, Commission on Social Living, Texas Baptist Conference, to review developments and to consider further church support and participation in the desegregation issue.

The Bombings

by Irving B. Zeichner

When the "Mad Bomber" of New York dramatized his grievances by planting time bombs in the Times Square area, the police, fearful of the power of suggestion, initially refrained from publicizing the incidents. The story that finally broke on the front pages evoked a flood of telephoned warnings which kept the bomb squad working overtime. Crackpot scares and hoaxes spread, not only throughout the city, but to other cities.

During the current tensions over desegregation, as part of several hundred incidents and threats, there have been eighty attempted and actual bombings of homes, schools and places of worship. The general impression exists that most if not all the acts of violence have been anti-semitic in nature. Eight bombings, or ten per cent, had Jewish targets.

Coincidence or not, within two days after New Jersey newspapers played up Southern bomb stories, windows were smashed in a Newark synagogue, a Jersey City synagogue received a bomb threat, and similar threats caused the Jewish Centers of Morristown and Elizabeth to be evacuated. This then spread to non-Jewish institutions.

Even if acts of violence appear to adopt a pattern temporarily directed against one particular group, the hostility is of that free floating quality which fastens itself to any group at any time with equal vehemence. Violence has already moved from the Southern eye of the storm into other sections of the country. As devoid of reason as it is deeply ingrained, hatred has the quality of contagion because of its primitive urges.

It is this quality of contagion which requires circumspection by the police in the handling of telephoned threats or crank letters. They know that to give publicity to such tension-loaded matters, even to incidents of unexploded bombs or minor vandalism, is to impede the investigations. They know, too, that contrariwise, acts of violence constitute news which should not be withheld from the public.

The people, who invariably look to the police for protection against themselves, are now face to face with a series of crimes born of social transition. If lawlessness unchecked can spread violence throughout the land, what then is being done by way of law enforcement?

Within days after bombs exploded in Jacksonville, Florida, Mayor Haydon Burns formed the Southern Conference on Bombings at which police officials from twenty-one cities exchanged intelligence on the Klans and like groups. As reports came into a filtering center, certain names cropped up repeatedly including those of the five later to be indicted in the Atlanta temple dynamiting. Though convictions are not easy to come by because of the nature of the crime, the arrests which followed in the wake of good police work have had a salutary effect in stemming the tide.

Strange as it may seem, a number of purported professional haters formed the "Citizens National Law Enforcement Commission" to combat the investigations of violence in Atlanta. The legend on the letterhead states that "This Committee Will Make Arrests, Themselves, When Facts Authorize Such Action." Fund-raising is carried on by a companion organization called the "National Committee To Secure Justice For The Atlanta Five."

The Atlanta bombing appeared to shock the South even more than the North. Mayor William B. Hartsfield declared, "Whether they like it or not, every rabble-rousing politician is the godfather of the cross-burners and the dynamiters who are giving the South a bad name." He added that the episode "pointed up the need for the decent people of the South to rise up and put an end to the preaching of hate and chaos."

The Southern press has accurately mirrored the sentiments and convictions of Southern people that civil order and obedience to law are supreme values overriding any subsidiary issues. The Atlanta Constitution, applauding the crackdown by police, stated explicitly that those who endanger the lives and property of others must pay the legal consequences.

It is essential that appropriate agencies of government press their investigations lest a school full of children be blown to bits as an end result of the bombings. Facilities of the F.B.I. laboratory in Washington and technical consultation in the field are available to local law enforcement officials. But, inasmuch as convictions have not been readily forthcoming, one proposal advanced would extend federal jurisdiction to crimes of this character by a legal presumption that the dynamite used crossed state lines.

If the duty of the police regarding acts of violence is clear, equally apparent is the responsibility of the community in dealing with the tensions from which come the impulses to violence. Group hostility feeds tensions and is, in turn, fed by them.

Community relations experts note that those prone to bigotry are dismayed not by exposure but by quarantine. Like teen-agers susceptible to delinquency, they feel the pull of its attraction and the thrill of its excitement whenever their anti-social acts attract attention.

The criminal, by his act of violence to attract attention, exiles himself to the outer fringes of society. He cannot be reached through the normal channels of communication as they are cut off from reason by his own hatred. He has become a subject of clinical and penal interest. Sooner or later, the forces of law and order—and if he is fortunate, medicine—will apprehend and either rehabilitate or punish him. Meanwhile, he remains an object of police attention. END

NAACP AND FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

A resolution Adopted by the Biennial Convention of the
American Jewish Congress
May 14-18, 1958
Miami Beach, Florida

The epoch-making decision of the United States Supreme Court declaring racial segregation in the public schools unconstitutional has given rise to a multiplicity of devices in efforts to frustrate that decision and to defeat or delay its effectuation. These efforts, in addition to perpetuating the denial of equality to millions of Americans, have themselves brought with them a host of other denials of fundamental constitutional liberties. One of the most serious of these has been and continues to be the denial of freedom of association.

Recognizing that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has been in the forefront of the struggle for equality and integration and that as a practical matter the successful implementation of the Supreme Court's anti-segregation decision rests in large measure upon its activities, many of the Southern states have launched a concerted attack upon the NAACP in a determined effort to destroy that organization or frustrate its actions. Practically every instrumentality of law and government in the South has been used to persecute the NAACP. It has been harassed at every turn by new laws enacted for that purpose and archaic laws revived for the same end. Legal processes and procedures have been used and abused to interfere with its legitimate activities. Unfounded charges have been leveled against it. It has been compelled to expose its membership lists and thus subjects its members to the threat of physical injury and economic duress. Registration and tax laws have been invoked against it. Its officers and members have been subjected to hostile legislative investigations reminiscent of the worst days of the McCarthy era. In general, all of the forces of law and government have been marshalled in a determined campaign to destroy it completely.

This assault upon the NAACP gravely threatens a basic freedom of our American democracy. Whether or not one agrees with the Supreme Court's school segregation decision; whether or not one favors speedy integration, gradual integration or even no integration at all; whatever may be one's views on the entire question of segregation, the danger to our democratic way of life posed by the assault upon the NAACP must be recognized by all.

A totalitarian state is by its nature suspicious of, if not actively hostile to, all associations not dominated by the state and looks to every such association as a potential rival if not enemy. Suppression of independent associations is a normal and necessary feature of totalitarian regimes, both fascist and communist.

Our American heritage proceeds on a different premise. It welcomes voluntary associations as an indispensable aspect of a democratic pluralistic society. It recognizes that freedom of association, like the other great freedoms of the First Amendment -- freedom of conscience and of speech -- are for those who exercise the freedom, but even more for the benefit of the community at large. It protects the people's right to hear, to know, to be informed, so that they may properly exercise their rights and fulfill their obligations as citizens.

As a voluntary organization of citizens formed to protect the rights of Jews, the American Jewish Congress has a special concern with the assault upon a voluntary organization of citizens formed to protect the rights of Negroes. Today it is the NAACP that is subjected to attack. Tomorrow it may well be any other organization.

For these reasons the American Jewish Congress

1. Calls upon all individuals and organizations dedicated to the maintenance of constitutional liberty to come to the defense of the NAACP against the unprincipled attack to which it is being subjected;

2. Calls upon the United States Civil Rights Commission to conduct a public investigation of the extent to which constitutional freedom has been invaded by these attacks, publish its findings, turn over to the Department of Justice any evidence of violation of Federal law that it uncovers, make necessary recommendations to Congress for additional legislation and take all further appropriate action;

3. Calls upon the United States Department of Justice to intervene in the various proceedings in the Southern states that are designed to outlaw the NAACP, paralyze its lawful activity or curb advocacy of its program of desegregating the public schools.

4. Calls upon the President of the United States to realize the vast potentiality for moral leadership inherent in his office by condemning publicly this campaign of suppression and exercising his influence to bring it to an end.

TO: ~~HCF~~ PA

In sending a list of 100 Southerners, as suggested recipients of Neither Black Nor White, to Mr. Schatz of the A.J.Congress, apparently it was felt that the state directors were of little significance.

Many persons, whose out-reach is far less than theirs, were included on the list.

I STRONGLY PROTEST THIS ATTITUDE AND ACTION ON OUR PART.

Dear Mr. Schatz:

Mr. Fleming, who is away from the office, has asked me to answer your letter of April 24th.

Enclosed is a list of 100 names for your mailing of Neither Black nor White. We have included very few Negroes since we assumed you wanted persons who were middle-of-the-road in race relations or persons who might be influential with the uncommitted. If you had not planned to send the book to Southern governors you might want to consider the Governors of North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana and Tennessee.

If we can be of further help please let us know.

Sincerely,

KASPER SUPPORTERS PREPARING FOR HIS RELEASE THIS SUMMER

Segregationist John Kasper will be released August 9 from Federal prison after having served nine months of a year's sentence for interfering with integration at Clinton High School in Tennessee. A record of good behavior in prison at Tallhassee, Fla., gained Kasper this early release. Furthermore, a recent ruling by a Federal judge will permit him to post a bond pending appeal of a second conviction for which he had been sentenced to an additional six-month term.

Kasper's cohorts in the Seaboard White Citizens Council of Washington, D.C., have already planned a welcoming rally near the prison grounds on the day of release.

During the young firebrand's imprisonment, his followers have not been idle. A pamphlet, Segregation or Death, just published by the Seaboard White Citizens Councils, capitalizes on Kasper's imprisonment by making a martyr of him, and sets forth the group's blatantly anti-Semitic goals:

> Ultimately, we, in our young movement, envision the complete legal disenfranchisement and legal expulsion of the Jew from > American "national life." ...We will not fail in this struggle, even in death. To those who oppose us, Marxist, usurer, race mixer, degenerate politician, we pledge eternal vigilance, eternal combativeness, even death!

An accelerated membership drive is currently underway, targeted particularly at young people. The membership application form circulated by the Seaboard Citizens Councils includes the following pledge:

> I am white, 18 years of age, believe in the separation of the races, in upholding racial segregation, am loyal to the United States of America and believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ.

POLITICAL FORTUNES OF CROMMELIN AND CARTER

Two well-known anti-Semitic agitators made bids for public office in Alabama in the May 6 primaries of that State. Running for the gubernatorial nomination on an all-out anti-Semitic platform, Admiral John G. Crommelin (ret.), polled 2,245 out of 618,000 votes. This poor showing was, however, somewhat offset by the vote for Asa ("Ace") Carter, anti-Semitic White Citizens Councils leader. In the race for nomination for Lieutenant Governor, he garnered 31,000 out of 435,000 votes. Carter is notoriously prominent in northern Alabama Klan circles, and has given much support to Frederick John Kasper.

Crommelin has told his followers that his campaign achieved the essential purpose of using politics as a vehicle for dissemination of his propaganda. In a post-election bulletin mailed to his supporters, he wrote:

> On the positive side of the ledger, there is no question but that we achieved the major objective set out in our "Platform," to wit: "To expose the origin, nature and aims of the Communist-Jewish Conspiracy." Although some of our information may have been over the heads of the uneducated voting element, still the great bulk of the Communist-Jewish Conspiracy is primarily responsible for the plot to integrate and mongrelize the South and all of America. Also, our "Platform," which was mailed and passed out to the tune of at least 250,000 copies, has done a tremendous educational job throughout the entire 48 States.

According to Crommelin, more than $9,000 was received in campaign contributions. By his own count, he made 142 stump speeches and appeared 15 times on television. For the future, the retired Admiral promises he will try to have "candidates in Alabama campaigning on this 'Platform' in 1960, for both houses of the U. S. Congress and all county and municipal offices." He further announces plans "for carrying this fight throughout the United States," inviting supporters to contact the "resident Executive Secretary" of his organization at the Wetumpka, Ala., office.

J. EDGAR HOOVER INFURIATES THE ANTI-SEMITIC PRESS

FBI Chief J. Edgar Hoover's best-selling book, Masters of Deceit, drew immediate fire from such leading anti-Semitic publications as Common Sense, National Renaissance Bulletin, Georgia Tribune and The Revere. The irritant was a passage congratulating the major Jewish organizations, including AJC, for their role in fighting communism. A typical comment from The Revere, a monthly, published by the Christian Patriots Crusade in Hinsdale, Ill.:

> Masters of Deceit was probably written by some foul-mouthed, Christ-hating Talmudist in the New York offices of the American Jewish Committee.

ULTRA-CONSERVATIVE GROUP ECHOES RACIST LINE

Task Force, official publication of the Defenders of the American Constitution, Inc., has mostly concerned itself with isolationism and related issues, especially attacks upon NATO.

In a recent issue, however, the publication featured a diatribe on the subject of Little Rock, "Bayonets for Bastardisation," by British journalist A. K. Chesterton. "The directing force -- the force which had power to dictate that Eisenhower should send Federal paratroopers to overawe Little Rock -- was not a Negro organization although Negro subversives have posts in it, but an organization of Zionists and Jews," Chesterton declares. He bolsters his argument with this quote from Common Sense:

> The two races in the South have been living in harmony for quote some time, and they understand each other. What then is the trouble? Jewish Communist organizers from New York have been agitating and indoctrinating young Negroes in the South.

The Defenders' president is General Pedro A. Del Valle whose record includes a public endorsement of the anti-Semitic writings of Robert H. Williams, and contributions to the pages of Common Sense.

TEXAS KLANSMAN LINKED TO KLAN VIOLENCE IN CHILE

In Santiago, Chile, on May 23, Franz Heinz, self-styled Grand Dragon of a Chilean Ku Klux Klan unit, and several followers were arrested. They confessed having committed terrorist acts against Jewish citizens and their property. Flags bearing the Nazi swastika and emblems of the KKK were found in their possession.

The group's activities were directed from Waco, Texas, according to Chilean police. Similar disturbances in England and Argentina also have been traced to Waco, where Horace Sherman Miller conducts a Klan-literature enterprise. (See FYI, December 1957.)

An Open Letter From The President

THANKS TO THE ROBINSONS

Dear ELSIE and LEO:

It was a pleasure to be a guest at your home. An AJCommittee function is always close to my heart. I know it is to yours. But, your warmth and graciousness as hosts always make our annual occasion an especially pleasant experience for all of us.

I know I speak for the AJC staff, the Executive Board, and the general membership when I express my gratitude for your generous gesture to our Committee each year.

All the members, your friends, join me in expressing personal thanks to you and warm wishes that you may both continue to serve with us in longlasting good health.

Sincerely,
NATHAN B. ROOD

An Appropriate Observation

A SALUTE TO SEYMOUR

When we realized that this issue of the SATELLITE would be out just before Father's Day, we asked SEYMOUR SAMET'S eight year old daughter, ROBERTA, to do a story of her daddy.

We offer this as a salute to our beloved Area Director:

"MR. SAMET is a very honest man" (Who should know this better than a daughter?).

"This is one way he helps in the community. If people do not have the same religion, he tries to help them understand each other.

"And, if they do, he does his best so they might be good friends.

"That is one of his jobs."

A Projected Step For Metro

Metropolitan Human Relations Board?

A resolution was introduced and approved at a recent meeting of our Executive Committee calling for the creation, within the framework of Dade County's Metro Government, of an official board whose function would be to foster good will and respect among the various religious, racial, and linguistic groups in our community.

Thereafter, an informal group of lawyers, educators, and social workers met to draft such an ordinance and place it before the Metro Commissioners. This group, after producing several draft proposals, agreed upon the terms of an ordinance to be proposed.

Modelled to some extent upon those enacted in other communities, the measure provides for the creation of a Community Relations Board composed of 15 members, broadly representative of the social, economic, religious, cultural and ethnic groups in the county, to be appointed by the County Commission.

The Board's functions would be twofold: (1) to foster mutual understanding and respect among all economic, social, religious and ethnic groups in the County, and (2) to make studies in the field of human relations.

The Board should be empowered, (a) to act as conciliator in controversies involving community relations, (b) to cooperate with Federal, state and city agencies in developing harmonious community relations, and (c) to cooperate with and enlist the support of civic, religious, veterans', labor, industrial, and commercial groups and civic leaders in the development of educational programs dedicated to the improvement of community understanding.

The draft ordinance was placed before the Board of County Commissioners on May 6th by Representative John B. Orr, Jr. The Commissioners thought the matter of sufficient importance to schedule an informal open hearing on Wednesday, May 21st, at which time the public could appear to express its views to the Commission.

Their action at this meeting was indecisive and they decided to turn the ordinance over to the County Attorney for his opinion as to the legality of portions of the ordinance. The County Attorney's views will probably be made available to the Commissioners within the next few weeks, and the matter will then be reconsidered by the Commissioners.

An Editorial

BOMBS AND THEN SILENCE

(This month, the SATELLITE is happy to offer the following and we stand in admiration of the dedicated spirit in which these thoughts were delivered by Ralph Renick, vice president in charge of news, on his nightly WTVJ telecast on May 6th.)

One man - a young construction worker - was arrested by police this weekend and charged with participating in the bombings of a Jacksonville synagogue and a Negro school. The arrest announcement coincided with the Conference in Jacksonville of Mayors and representatives of four southern cities - including Miami - which have been plagued by terrorist acts involving the use of dynamite.

The day after the Conference ended - the police announced they had the wrong man - - he actually had nothing to do with the bombings.

So, to date, there has been one arrest in Florida - of the wrong man - in the wake of police investigations into the dynamitings. A probe of this kind does entail security restrictions and the police necessarily have to keep information on the extent of their probe secret.

However, too much secrecy has one unfortunate result - it gives encouragement to those who perpetrated the acts. And the announcement in Jacksonville over the weekend concerning the arrest of a prime suspect, who was later cleared, certainly doesn't do anything to discourage the moronic group who placed the dynamite.

Every decent citizen is prepared to cooperate with the police in their investigation - and every decent citizen is hoping for some action on the part of the police to bring the guilty parties to trial.

The Beth El Synagogue bombing in Miami occurred 53 days ago. There has been no word since on progress of the investigation. Nobody wants to hamper the probe - yet at the same time, some word as to what's going on would be extremely helpful now.

Continued silence may encourage further violence.

With Sincere Sympathy

In Memoriam

Members of the local American Jewish Committee staff, Executive Board and general membership express their sincere sympathy to MRS. ALEX RUBIN, who recently lost her father, and to MRS. EDWARD ROTH, whose father passed away within recent weeks.

As An Added Service

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE FORMED

Under the chairmanship of DR. PERITZ SCHEINBERG, the AJCommittee now has a dynamic International Affairs Committee. Among those who are members already are DR. BERTHOLD C. FRIEDL, HENDRIK BERNS, LEO MINDLIN, BILL AGRANOVE, MIKE BASKIN, VICTOR EBER, SEYMOUR LIEBMAN, MRS. BERNARD STEVENS and MRS. SCHEINBERG.

At a recent meeting, the committee agreed that there was a great need in this community for a group organized for the specific purpose of helping to keep public sources of information informed on all points of view pertaining to Middle East situations.

Actually, this would be a reservoir of information pertaining to various problems in the Middle East, so that as new situations develop background material could be given to local mass media.

As a first step, the group is to gather data. Then, as a proposed follow up the committee hopes to brief the Executive Committee, the full membership, and, finally the Greater Miami community via the local press, radio and television facilities.

This is an ambitious program and we congratulate the committee for approaching it with great energy and vision.

STAFF COMINGS AND GOINGS

JESSICA SCHWARZ recently spent a week in New York City, where she conferred with MR. LOUIS BREIER of the National Office on our Chapter's Discussion Groups. JESS reports that MR. BREIER was greatly impressed with the full program we conduct in this area.

On May 27th-29th, SEMOUR SAMET attended a Southern Inter-Agency Group meeting in Atlanta, Georgia. The purpose of the meeting was to give professionals of all agencies in the Southeast an opportunity to compare notes, information and to work jointly on projects of mutual interest. The Southern Regional Council acted as coordinator of the meeting.

STAN LEIBNER wings his way to Chicago on June 9th and will remain until June 20th for a National Conference of all "interns" who are under the training program in which STAN is engaged.

(STAN promises to spread the gospel about our local chapter and the benefits of Miami living to the other interns who had the misfortune of going to different agencies in other parts of the country.)

OUR STORY OF THE MONTH

The fledgling state of Israel, now celebrating its 10th anniversary year, has had a busy decade of defense and building. But its people haven't forgotten how to laugh.

They've created a remarkable language, Pinglish -- Palestine English -- translated from Yiddish or Hebrew idioms. Ruth Gruber, in Israel Today: Land of Many Nations (Hill and Wang, $3.95), offers some fine examples of Pinglish as seen on Israeli store and business signs:

A butcher has the gory information strung across his shop: I AM KILLING MYSELF TWICE A DAY.

A women's dress shop declares solicitiously: WOMEN CAN HAVE FITS HERE BY APPOINTMENT.

And a doctor calls himself: SPECIALIST FOR WOMEN AND OTHER DISEASES.

The Russians also come in for a great deal of Israeli kidding, author Ruth Gruber reports. After Kruschev revealed Stalin's anti-Semitism, one story goes,

Another Point Of View Is Expressed

"THE PURSUIT OF EQUALITY"

"This book portrays the American Jewish Committee in its fiftieth year, and the convictions and aspirations which have guided us.

"These pages record, in word and picture, endeavors pursued with our fellow citizens of all religions and races to help obtain for all mankind those 'unalienable rights' set forth in America's documents of freedom. It is the story of how a particular group of men and women have associated themselves in a voluntary enterprise to affirm and enrich their spiritual heritage; to strengthen America by preserving and extending civil rights and liberties; and to make human rights secure throughout the world.

Happily, in this country, respect for the dignity of the individual and belief in the invoilability of human rights belong to no one creed; they form the basic tenets of our Judeo-Christian heritage. Hence, the story of the American Jewish Committee is but a part of a larger account of how 'the pursuit of human equality' has fared at home and abroad during the five decades past and of its prospects for the decades ahead.

"We present it here as testimony to our cherished twin inheritance--American freedom and Jewish faith." (FROM THE INTRODUCTION BY JACOB BLAUSTEIN)

Kruschev cabled President Eisenhower: "Ike, will you take Stalin's body?" Ike cabled back: "We don't take Commies, dead or alive."

Kruschev then cabled Ben-Gurion, Israel's prime minister: "Will you take Stalin's body?" Ben-Gurion answered: "Of course we'll take his body. But remember this is the country of the Resurrection."

Kruschev cabled back: "No go; Have decided to keep body in Kremlin."

STUDY OF SCHOOLS IN SUBURBS IS SET

A research project aimed at identifying and alleviating some of the social and educational problems confronting changing suburban communities is underway at Columbia University's Teachers College.

The study, which may run five years, is being aided by a $35,000 grant from the American Jewish Committee.

According to Dr. Stephen M. Corey, dean of the college, the eighteen-month exploratory phase of the project will seek to identify school problems in the suburban New York City area, which have been affected by a heavy influx of former city residents. Results of the preliminary study will point up the issues requiring extended and more critical examination.

The second phase will involve making a case study of one suburban community that has had a recent and large influx of new residents from the city.

An over-all objective, Dean Corey said, would be to develop ways to eliminate or lessen tensions and other problems found in suburban schools through the schools' instructional programs.

The college and the American Jewish Committee plan to make the findings of the project available to national organizations concerned with intergroup relations.

The project is being administered by the Teachers College Department of Curriculum and Teaching. Prof. Alice M. Miel and Luther W. Pfluger are in charge of the preliminary research.

Importance of Project

Discussing the importance of the new undertaking, Professor Miel said:

"Many communities adjacent to our larger cities must adjust to a shifting and rapidly growing population. Teachers in public schools are often called on to adjust rather quickly to children of unfamiliar backgrounds at the same time the children themselves are making difficult adjustments.

Another In A Series

This We Believe

We pledge ourselves to continue the fight against those who through bigotry and prejudice imperil the rights of the members of any group, thus dividing our country and undermining American liberty.

It is now possible to envision a society that attaches primary value to the individual and treats each person solely on his own merits. Those who are the targets of prejudice can make a significant contribution to the pursuit of equality. Besides joining in the larger fight against prejudice, they should guard against accepting for themselves their detractors' false and derogatory appraisals of them. Self-respect is a most effective antidote to prejudice, and happily it is encouraged by the American pattern of religious, ethnic and racial diversity.

Judaism, as a great historic religion, has developed traditions of deep moral, social and cultural significance. Among these are reverence for learning, a prophetical passion for social justice, the insistence that charity is a form of justice to the less fortunate, abhorrence of war and love of peace, and the conviction that each human being, created in the image of God, is the equal of every other. We should know our heritage, so that it may ennoble our lives and help us to enrich our contributions, in concert with our fellow citizens of all other faiths, to American civilization.

Under the American system of voluntary association, individuals join together in organizations which best express their views. We believe in cooperation within areas of agreement for the more effective achievement of common goals, but we also believe that no one organization can speak for the Jews of America or of the world. Therefore, the views, policies and programs of the American Jewish Committee can be determined only by our own members and governing boards. As always, we stand ready to work with others for the accomplishment of common aims in ways which will not impair the integrity of our organization or our independence of decision and action.

POINT OF VIEW

show that a great deal of this military aid is foisted upon many small countries and incurs burdens they cannot afford to carry, gives ample proof that America will win more friends among foreign peoples by increasing economic and technical aid rather than giving arms and munitions to nations that have inadequate armies and where there is no desire to become embroiled in a war.

"Indonesia and Cuba are two excellent examples of how ineffective military forces can be. The regular army in neither of these two nations has been able to quell insurrection in these countries. I do not want this comment to indicate that I am for or against the revolutionary forces.

"Foreign aid should be used to raise the standards of nations. I wish it to be noted that I have pointedly ignored the waste of millions of dollars in military supplies given to Arab lands around the Middle East. These arms will never be used against Russia and here we are skirting the greater problem of improving the lot of the downtrodden and persecuted."

As a final word on the subject, here is the text of a resolution adopted at the recent AJCommittee national convention:

Resolved, that the American Jewish Committee at its 51st Annual Meeting strongly supports the Mutual Security Program and the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and urges Congress to enact legislation on both matters as proposed by the President, without reduction and without restrictive amendments.

As a result of plans initiated by me and members of the Chapter Committee on International Affairs, plans have been projected for a community audit of human rights in Dade County. The audit will be along the lines suggested in the guide "In Your Hands."

To date we were able to get Mrs. Stuart Austin, President of the United Church Women of Greater Miami to convene local members of the national sponsors of this program. They agreed to conduct an audit in seven areas: Employment; Education; Public Health; Recreation; Public Accomodations; Government (voting rights, jury service, etc.); and Housing.

All the investigations will be conducted by inter-organizational committees. Each organization will agree to coordinate the research in one area. AJCommittee has already agreed to do this for Education and a planning meeting is already set up.

Resources to be solicited include several departments at the University of Miami, the research staff of the Welfare Planning Council and the professionals of participating groups.

The groups which are currently represented include:

AJCommittee
AJCongress
Anti-Defamation League
Council of Churches
Congregational Church
Dade County Council on Community Relations
Home Lazarus Club
Miami Ethical Society
Miami Latin Center
Nat'l Council of Negro Women
St. Philips Episcopal Church
Trinity Methodist Church
United Church of Church
United Nations Association
United Nations Church Women
Women's International League for Peace and Freedom
Women's Society of Christian Service
YWCA - Murrell Branch
YWCA

There are still numerous important details to clear up before we get started. Not the least is official agreement on co-sponsorship. My leaving for Bethel provides a big gap in my ability to follow thru but there are some good people involved who should prove of tremendous value.

Incidentally, is any money available - as far as you know - to subsidize this kind of an audit? It would be of tremendous hlep if we could get an idea of where some such help might be obtained.

Vol. III, No. 7, July 1958

BIAS IN MERCURY RISING

New York industrialist Russell Maguire's monthly magazine, American Mercury, continues its trend toward bigotry.

The July issue advises:

> "If bombs are dropped on the U. S., over 90 percent of our casualties will be from broken glass and splinters. Disregarding these facts all new buildings (except synagogues) continue to be built with enormous quantities of glass."

Included in the issue are "fillers" harping away at "international bankers," and quotations attributed to the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin and Lawrence Dennis, author of "The Coming American Fascism." The former describes the major political parties as wings "of the same bird of prey -- the banker," while the latter inveighs against the Federal Reserve Act.

Letters to the editor include one from Don Bell, publisher of the hate-sheet, Don Bell Reports, and another from Gen. Pedro A. del Valle, who several years ago openly endorsed the anti-Semitic writings of Robert H. Williams. Both letters, although not citing Jews, refer to "the Invisible Government."

Another contributor is anti-Semitic political campaigner, John Crommelin (see F.Y.I. Feb.-March, 1958), whose article is devoted to questioning current national developments, concluding with:

> Could it be that all of these scare events and all this propaganda are timed to frighten American citizens into accepting federal control of our school systems - integration - and further destructive taxation? Lenin himself promised us national bankruptcy.

Resignation of the publication's managing editor, William LaVarre, is announced in the same issue. Shortly after Maguire acquired the Mercury in 1952 a substantial part of the editorial staff resigned in disagreement with the new owner's policies. Maguire at that time was extensively distributing John O. Beaty's book, Iron Curtain Over America, an anti-Semitic political diatribe which glorified Prussianism.

ACTIVISTS MOBILIZE FOR PROPAGANDA AND "POLITICS"

The Thunderbolt, a new mimeographed publication bearing a familiar Aryan emblem, announces a "merger" of the United White Party and the so-called National States Rights Party.

The NSRP, which makes its headquarters with Mrs. Peter Cowan of Jeffersonville, Ind., is not connected with the larger political movement of similar name in the South. The roster of NSRP's officials includes Matt Koehl, who bears the title of "Organizer." Koehl has long been active in the more vitriolic segment of the hate movement.

NSRP obviously does not intend to overlook the North. It claims that "units" are being established in New York and Oregon, as well as Atlanta, Louisville and Knoxville.

Thunderbolt, besides attacking the F.B.I. and Jewish organizations, supports Conde McGinley's Common Sense, and urges readers to "Draft Crommelin for President."

While NSRP does not at present appear to be more than an embryonic movement, its potential for propaganda should not be overlooked. On July 1, a notice to "Fellow Patriots" announced a "Welcome Back Kasper March.... We want to send a motorcade from Louisville, Washington, Knoxville, Nashville, Atlanta and other points converging on Tallahassee August 9...."

John Frederick Kasper, racist rabblerouser and head of the Seaboard White Citizens Council, is slated for release from Federal Correctional Institute at Tallahassee, August 9.

NEW RACIST "CORPORATION" OFFERS "SHARES"

Admiral John G. Crommelin's campaign manager, Ned Harman, has just launched a movement from Crommelin's former political headquarters at Wetumpka, Ala. (See FYI, June 1958).

Propaganda leaflets, issued during July, variously refer to the movement as "The Good Old U.S.A., Inc.," "The United Voters' Club" and "Manasseh -- U.S.A."

Employing a not-too-clear corporate style, one of the leaflets is headed "Certificate of Stock Ownership in the Good Old U. S. A., Inc." It provides appropriate space for "name of owner" and gives directions for "registration with Congressmen." Though heavily infused with legalisms, the import emerges:

> WE, THE UNDERSIGNED SOVEREIGN WHITE CHRISTIAN CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, of lawful age and duly qualified voters thereof, hereby issue, sign, execute and deliver to and among ourselves as such Citizens aforesaid.
> THE ONE-SHARE OF COMMON STOCK OF THE GOOD OLD USA, INC., to which each is entitled as such voting-citizens, now evidenced by this stock-certificate in writing; said citizen-stock and all the shares thereof to be dividend-bearing annually, which said income-dividends replacing income-taxes against individuals, are to be exempt not only from income-taxes, hereby repealed and cancelled as to individuals, but also taxes of any other kind or nature whatsoever.

Accompanying the leaflet is an enrollment form referring to the United Voters Club and to "Manasseh - U. S. A.," advising that:

> ...We fight the Jewish Communist Conspiracy with ballots; to be registered with our lawful representatives in Congress....During "Cease Fire" with physical weapons -- bayonets, bullets, bombs -- we must fight on with our intellects, with spiritual weapons and win the peace with these revolutionary ballots....

Dear Dr. Fineberg:

Right after I last saw you in New York, Harry Fleishman and I took part in a discussion of the Citizens' Council Forum with other members of the Mass Media Committee. We agreed then that each of us would do what we could to get access to these films and tapes, so that we could be guided by a first-hand evaluation of their contents.

My own efforts in this direction to date have not been successful. The problem is that radio and television people sympathetic to our point of view are unwilling to subscribe to the series, since this would enable the Citizens' Council to make capital of that fact. As you will see from the enclosure, the Citizens' Council is publicizing the names of stations which order the material. I must say that, though I had not anticipated this particular problem, I had considerable sympathy with the radio and television people who do not want to get their names on the Citizens' Council's "sucker" list. We are still working on the problem, and if we have any luck I will let you know.

One alternative, though a poor one, is to have friends audit the broadcasts in those places shown on the attached schedule. Than, if the material is objectionable - as I would expect it to be - representations might be made to the stations presenting it.

I shall be glad to pass on to you any further information we can get, and I hope you will do the same for us.

I enjoyed my visit with you and the other members of the AJC staff, and I hope you will call on us whenever you are in Atlanta.

Cordially,

RE: CITIZENS COUNCIL FORUM, 1014 Plaza Building, Jackson, Miss.

This film TV series of interviews, "presenting the American Viewpoint with a Southern Accent" billed as originating from Washington, is available from the headquarters of the Citizens Councils of Mississippi, at the above address. This group is the parent of the Citizens Council movement throughout the South, although most of the others are virtually autonomous in their publications and actions. The above address is also the headquarters of the Citizens Councils of America, which essays the role of general informational clearing house of the Citizens Councils movement, and publishes a monthly, The Citizens Council.

Prime movers of the Citizens Councils of Mississippi (formerly known as the White Citizens Councils), almost since its inception in 1954, are Robert B. Patterson, who is its Executive Secretary, and W. J. Simmons, who has the title of Administrator. The Citizens Council lists W. J. Simmons as its editor, and Robert B. Patterson on its Editorial Board.

The Citizens Council promotes the straight, segregationist line, provides news of meetings of various Councils, often reprinting compatible editorial cartoons. Its contents are not anti-Semitic.

How representative the Citizens Councils of Mississippi and the Citizens Councils of America are of the entire movement cannot be ascertained because of the loose structure of the movement generally. The self-governing organizations designating themselves Citizens Councils of various localities run the gamut from the Alabama White Citizens' Councils, headed by a State Senator, which openly opposes the Klan and violence, to the Citizens' Council headed by Asa ("Ace") Carter, several of whose members assaulted Nat King Cole on the stage of a Birmingham theater. The Citizens Councils of America does not evidence any association with groups of the Ace Carter or Kasper variety.

In a recent letter to Senator Jacob K. Javits, written in his capacity as Secretary of the Citizens Councils of America, Patterson said, in part:

> Many Southerners now say, "If the Jewish organizations, the Jewish propaganda media and the Jewish individual leadership were removed from the drive to force integration, there would be no drive." Anti-Semitic literature is now being distributed by the ton throughout the South as well as throughout the nation....
> The greatest favor you could do this nation, the Negro race and Jewish people everywhere, would be to side with Senators Eastland, Talmadge and other Southerners against forced integration....

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Some of our national staff have become interested in a radio series which is being made available to local stations by the Citizens' Council Forum, sponsored by the Citizens' Council of America, whose office is in Jackson, Miss.

I have addressed an inquiry on this subject to a well informed friend in Jackson, but it now occurs to me a few days after writing to him, that he is probably on vacation. Since he has no staff that might handle the inquiry, I may not get a reply for some time. You are probably well informed about these broadcasts and have some information on it — perhaps even a mimeographed memo on the subject.

We are, of course, wondering whether these programs are anti-Semitic, or whether they are flagrantly inciting, or whether they are somewhat constrained in their attacks on those who advocate desegregation. Whatever information you can furnish on this subject will be greatly appreciated and we will be especially glad to receive copy of one or several scripts, or even a platter that has been sent to radio stations.

Hoping that you are having a very pleasant summer and with regards from your friends at the AJC office, I am

Quoted
From The Daily News (New York)

Series of Articles, "New Cross Afire in Dixie by James T. Desmond

November 22 - 26, 1956

In a letter secretly sent out on Aug. 31, 1954, Patterson* advised every new White Citizens Council to designate a member to subscribe to 35 publications put out by professional bigots and white supremacists "in order that you may have the information" that they publish.

"Some of these groups are anti-Semitic," Patterson wrote. "However, all of the religious groups including all Protestants, Catholic and Jewish have been pushing the anti-segregation issue and it is time for all of us to speak out for separation of black and white races; regardless of our race or creed."

The accompanying list suggested as required reading such publications as "The Cross and the Flag," put out by the veteran bigot, Gerald L. K. Smith; "The White Sentinel," originating in St. Louis, Mo.; a rash of California publications dedicated to white supremacy, and the output of such groups as the Christian Nationalist Crusade, of Los Angeles; the National Association for the Advancement of White People, of Washington, D. C. and the National Association for the Advancement and Protection of the Majority of White People, Inc., of Griffin, Ga.

As to Simmons, the writer says:

Within a month (after organization) a state organization was set up with headquarters in the Walthall Hotel in Jackson and W. J. Simmons, a fruit broker and sometime British army officer, was installed as "administrator," as a sort of counterweight to Patterson, the ebullient executive secretary....

Dear Fred:

I am attaching a copy of a memorandum to my national office referring to our plans for a community audit to be held in Miami. We will obviously need considerable assistance in order to develop this project. Could you give me some indication of what resources might be available to us. Several questions come to mind:

1. Is it possible that the Southern Inter-Agency Group can lend professional assistance in developing the research guides, etc?

2. Are professional consultants available to us for specific responsibilities before, during, and after the survey?

3. Is money available from any source that you are aware of which can be used to subsidize the cost of this project?

I am leaving July 9th for Bethel, Maine, where I will attend the group dynamics laboratory program at Gould Academy for the next three weeks. Please don't wait for my return, however, but send your information on to Jessica Schwarz here in my office and she will share it with the appropriate individuals.

Many thanks for your help. My best regards.

Dear Mrs. Schwarz:

I have recently received Seymour Samet's letter of July 8, enclosing a copy of a memo to your national office regarding a proposed community audit. He asks that I not wait until his return from Bethel to answer the letter, but direct my reply to you. Hence, this letter.

Seymour raised three questions:

1. "Is it possible that the Southern Inter-Agency Group can lend professional assistance in developing the research guides, etc.?"
   The Southern Inter-Agency Conference might well be interested in such a project. The only adequate way to determine this, however, is to submit a fully detailed proposal at their next meeting. (August 7-8)

2. "Are professional consultants available to us for specific responsibilities before, during, and after the survey?"
   Dr. Herman Long, Director of the Race Relations Institute, Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee, has developed and supervised considerable work in this area. He or others connected with the Institute could be of considerable help. As to SRC's consultants, they could be of help in the period following the survey in offering consultative services, if action programs develop out of the survey.

3. "Is money available from any source that you are aware of which can be used to subsidize the cost of this project?"
   I know of no specific source for funds, but your own organization and the National Conference of Christians and Jews have helped underwrite such projects in the past. A properly prepared request to one of the foundations might strike a responsive chord.

One more suggestion: Dr. Irwin T. Sanders, Department of Sociology, University of Kentucky, Lexington, Kentucky, has had considerable experience in this type project.

I trust this is helpful. All good wishes.

Dear Mr. Fleming (or Harold might be better):

Thanks for your letter of July 16. I told one of my colleagues that you would probably answer pretty much as you did and am therefore not surprised by your reply. And yet, writing to you brought something decidedly advantageous - namely, the list of places the broadcasts may be heard. I have reliable correspondents in some of these cities and shall write to them requesting that they view the telecast.

I am sorry I did not know that Harry Fleischman had already spoken to you about this, but ours is a large organization and it is impossible that everyone be informed all the time. We still talk of your visit here with great satisfaction and we feel you helped us a great deal.

CONGRESS QUARTERLY DIGEST
- Published by The South Florida Council -

Volume 1, Number 1: August 1958 - Av 5718

AN INTRODUCTION

This publication is begun in an effort to inform the membership and others about the activities of the American Jewish Congress... Some of the material will be new...some old...some timely....all of value....Suggestions for improvement are sincerely solicited... Occasionally, some individuals will be named in connection with some work done or honor won....any omissions are purely unintentional and coincidental!

SO, WHAT'S NEW?

Presidents....Women's Division, MRS. DAVID (BEA) MUSKAT....Louise Brandeis, MRS. MICHAEL (RHODA) SOSSIN....Miami, MRS. IRVING (RUTH) QUARTIN....Dade Men, FRED BARAD....and something else is new...two CHAPTERS....BISCAYNE, organized by MRS. ABRAHAM (MILDRED) AUGENSTEIN and MRS. SIDNEY (HELEN) FINGER, is our newest women's chapter..... Congratulations! We also have a new MR. and MRS. chapter....formed with tremendous help from ex-Congress exec, now insuranceman, BERNARD SEGAL. Another Mazeltov....Biscayne and Mr. and Mrs. will apply for charters with the first National Executive Committee Meeting....both have officers, constitutions and paid up charter members....The growth has begun....

The Dade County School Board rushed through its fingerprinting resolution at a special meeting which lasted all of forty minutes... ANNA BRENNER MEYERS, our National Vice President and Woman of the Year, did her best to stop the stampede....Anna, who cast the lone vote against fingerprinting all school personnel, explained that all faculty members and personnel are engaged only after records, references and degrees are certified by the State Department of Education. This action is not only an invasion of privacy, but lowers the dignity of the teaching profession by the implication of criminal investigation and serves as no safeguard to moral behavior....None of eight cities contacted for information about fingerprinting practices engages in same...cities include Detroit, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Atlanta, etc.....Wonder whether politics can account for the stampede?

Speaking of the School Board, the American Civil Liberties Union has just sent a comprehensive questionnaire to all Board candidates, asking how they stand on civil liberties and civil rights issues.... one of the questions, "What is your position on desegregation?"..... another, "What is your position on distribution of Bibles in the public schools?"...Questionnaire also asks positions on baccalaureate services and Christmas observances.....We will try to obtain the results from the ACLU when the questionnaires are returned..... Some of the answers should be most interesting....Incidently, Episcopalian Dorothy Smith Mitchell vigorously opposes religion in the public schools....you should hear her!...If she succeeds in her bid for the School Board, a number of people will be hearing from her....

ELECTIONS ARE COMING

By the time the DIGEST reaches you it will be too late to register, but not too late to vote.....The political campaigns are getting hotter with each passing day....Segregation has become a vital issue in the race for the Florida Legislature....JACK ORR is a favorite target of the segregationists....ORR was the only one in the Florida House of Representatives to vote against segregation measures....he's been a target ever since....Rumors around town have it that many thousands of dollars have been raised to insure his defeat....The victory scored by Governor Faubus in Arkansas is heartening to all the segregationists in the South.... it may well set an example for other candidates to follow.... Haven't seen the figures, but it's a safe bet the liberals started too late with too little....Moral of the story...if you have convictions, vote 'em! ....Run-off election falls on September 30th, second day of Succoth...We are trying now to obtain a ruling from the Florida Attorney General as to whether those observing the holiday may cast an absentee ballot....chances appear slim that the law will allow it....Polls are open 7 to 7....Sundown comes just after 6:10 on September 30th...go to Shul, but go to the polls to vote before you go home to dinner....

INVESTIGATIONS AND SEGREGATION

The Johns' Committee is headed back to Miami....the date was set for August 11th, but the action of the Florida Supreme Court in scheduling a full hearing for Father Gibson, NAACP head, on September 2nd, may well postpone the Miami show....Senator Eastland has been drawing a bead on integrationists in Atlanta hearings recently....Louisiana has just put into effect a law which requires the Red Cross to label blood...whether it came from Negro or White.. The scientists who tell us there is no difference in blood of different races must be going back to their books! Judge Lemley's decision on Little Rock integration rocked the liberal South and all of the North...The Appeals Court in St. Louis may have ruled on the appeal from that decision by the time you read this.....Watch for an interesting hearing August 16, 17, 18 in the court of Federal Judge LIEB....a decision in favor of the NAACP could result in Miami schools desegregating....Interesting to hear Superintendent JOE HALL testify there is no legal segregation in our schools.... Scouts are out trying to find one white in a Negro school and one Negro in a white one....no luck so far.

MEMBERSHIP FORMULA FOR DOUBLING

Every Congress woman enrolls her husband. Every Congress man enrolls his wife....result....membership doubles! November is Congress Month, but why wait? Watch for the Women's Division paid up Membership Tea November 25th....Dr. Prinz has been asked to speak.

SOCIAL ACTION MEMOS

Will Maslow, General Counsel for Congress testified in behalf of the Loser Bill to make use of dynamite for illegal purposes a Federal offense...U.S. Justice Department sent no representatives to testify....Little Rock must cast a long shadow!

Senator Humphreys of Minnesota has introduced a resolution to make the United States a party to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights... So far the U.S. hasn't ratified the Genocide Convention...we seem to be steering clear of the Human Rights issue as well....Senators should be urged to pass the Humphreys resolution....

Attorney Bernard Mandler has been elected chairman of our local CLSA....just organized this past month...we look for big things from the Commission on Law and Social Action....

The Dade County Council on Community Relations, which was organized following the 1951 bombings to establish communication between all segments of the community and to ease tension is having a tough time financially....One of the problems in an organization which serves as a clearing house and community representative body is that no one accepts the full responsibility for seeing that enough funds are available...each group looks to the other to raise the necessary money....It would be tragic to lose the only non-sectarian community action group we have....Memberships in the DCCCR cost as little as $5.....donations in any amount will be accepted....the address is Metropolitan Building, Miami 32.....

DENT IN THE ARAB BOYCOTT

One of the results of the Arab boycott was the reduction of American Express facilities in Israel....the action of the company was publicized...now...we are happy to report that the American Express Company has undertaken a joint promotion of travel to Israel with the Israel Government Tourist Corporation....American Express will enlarge and modernize its agency in Israel....Presidents of major Jewish organizations praised American Express for its action.. One of the AAA representatives visited the office the other day... in the course of our conversation he told of not being able to visit Israel when he was in the Middle East...he's Irish descent...he was stationed in Lebanon and wanted to see Israel, but was told he couldn't return to any Arab country if he did....you should hear his opinion of the Arab Boycott policies and his criticism of our State Department for not protesting....Congratulations to the MIAMI HERALD for their editorial on July 31st re the Arab plans to destroy Israel.. Senator FLANDERS, while protesting he's not anti-semitic, is parroting the Arab propagandists in his Senate speeches lately.... he proposes stopping tax exemption on gifts to UJA funds which are sent to Israel....the same proposal was made some time ago by one of the Arab diplomats who called upon Congress to enact legislation to that end.....

THIS AND THAT

United Church Women have undertaken a community audit to ascertain the current practices in the metropolitan area of Miami re housing, public accommodations, employment, recreation, health, education and political rights....Congress is cooperating...MRS. CHARLES P. (DOROTHY) FEINBERG is our representative on the Steering Committee and MRS. ALFRED M. (LILLIAN) MAMLET heads the public accommodation committee....Plans are to release the survey results at a big meeting to be held on December 10th...Human Rights Day....A leadership course will be set up in the Fall....open on a registration basis to all Congress members....course is designed to teach proper way to conduct a meeting, give reports, lead discussions, etc.....dates will be announced early in September.....Louise Brandeis is setting up a class in Conversational Hebrew.... MRS. CHARLES P. (DOROTHY) FEINBERG is making arrangements....sounds like a good thing for the members.....The new CORE program put out by the Women's Division is a real humdinger....programs on Jewish living promise to be exciting...almost as exciting as the Great Debate at the Convention....that's still having repercussions and will for some time to come....Some of the same points of view were expressed at the recent meeting of the World Jewish Congress in Geneva...Maintaining Jewish identity is becoming a more important theme daily....watch for others to follow Congress' lead in this field.

The Southern Region of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds has created a regional community relations committee chaired by SAM HEIMAN....At a recent meeting in Atlanta attended by community leaders and national agency representatives, the Congress was raked over the coals for having Martin Luther King as a speaker during the national biennial convention...We were told to have King was to jeopardize the position of Jews in other Southern Communities... It would appear we could have had King with no objections if there were no publicity...The Southern newspapers really played up his appearance before a Jewish organization...Note....no specific negative incidents against Jews have been reported due to King's appearance... just newspaper articles and editorials....Many leaders pointed out Miami is not the South and Congress should not judge its public positions on advice from Miami. If we're not South why are schools still segregated?

HARRY GOLDEN has come up with another of his "plans"....teach Negroes to speak French...they will then be regarded as foreigners and be accorded not only equal but courteous treatment....his "out of order" drinking fountain plan has been tried and found to work....County Manager CAMPBELL should please note...the County Building has Negro and White drinking fountains on every floor....

SIGN OFF

Enjoy the summer....Remember to vote on September 9th.....Let's make the Fall the beginning of a real Congress year....

STEPHEN WISE CONGRESS HOUSE · 15 EAST 84TH STREET · NEW YORK 28, N. Y. · TRAFALGAR 9-4500

November 18, 1958

Dear Friend:

On September 26th, Rabbi Prinz addressed a letter to President Eisenhower urging him to summon the country's leaders in the field of religion, education, social welfare, labor and business to a meeting at the White House to spell out for every American the democratic principles that underly our existence as a nation. From such a meeting, he suggested, could come a Presidential proclamation of equality in which the full authority and prestige of the office of the President would be placed in support of the moral principle of integration and the basic concept of obedience to court decisions.

Within a few weeks thereafter, the conscience of America was shocked by a series of acts and threats of violence, including particularly the dynamiting of a public high school in Clinton, Tennessee and the bombing of a Jewish temple in Atlanta, Georgia. On October 12th, Rabbi Prinz wired the President applauding his statement in which he deplored the violence that had erupted and welcoming his assurances to the American people that every facility of our Federal Government was being employed to track down the perpetrators of these attacks. Rabbi Prinz suggested that these outrages emphasized once again the need for vigorous action on the part of the President to mobilize the forces of decency and democracy in our country. On October 16th, the President replied that he would, together with his associates, give our suggestion "careful consideration." Copies of this correspondence are enclosed with this letter.

Recognizing that the President's decision whether to call such a meeting will depend in large measure upon whether significant portions of the American public let him know they believe that such a meeting is practicable and desirable, we have written to a number of national leaders suggesting that they endorse the proposal. Up to this time, support for the calling of such a meeting has been expressed by a number of organizations, including the Young Women's Christian Association, the Rabbinical Council of America, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the Southern Regional Council, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

New York 28, N.Y.

September 26, 1958

The Hon. Dwight D. Eisenhower
President of the United States
The White House
Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. President:

The American Jewish Congress warmly applauds your statement deploring the closing of schools over the issue of racial segregation. We are particularly gratified that your message to the Charlottesville Committee for Public Education cited the American democratic ideal of the brotherhood of man, and emphasized that we all are equal in the sight of God.

As a natural and logical outgrowth of your statement, Mr. President, we respectfully suggest that you call a White House Conference on Equality to rally the American people in support of the 1954 Supreme Court decision calling for school integration.

Our country faces its most profound moral crisis since the Civil War. At stake are the two most precious inheritances of our American democracy -- respect for the individual, derived from the great religious principle that all men are the creatures of God; and respect for law, the foundation of all liberty, which has given the American experiment in democracy its inner strength and stability.

When in 1954 the United States Supreme Court issued its historic decision declaring that enforced racial segregation in the public schools violates the Constitutional guarantee of equality, friends of freedom everywhere rejoiced. In the South, millions long accustomed to segregation accepted the eventual racial integration of their schools, hoping at most to delay rather than to frustrate the Court's decision. Defiance of the Court was expressed by only a small minority of Southern whites.

Today the picture is tragically reversed. One hears few -- if any -- influential voices in the South speaking of effecting integration with a minimum of disharmony and conflict. The cry of uncompromising resistance dominates the South.

It is for this reason that we respectfully urge you, Mr. President, to summon the country's leaders in the field of religion, education and social welfare to a national conference at which the underlying issue of the whole question of integration -- the immorality of racial segregation -- would be clearly enunciated. An appropriate time for such a national conference would be Thanksgiving Day, on which every American expresses gratitude for the life, liberty and pursuit of happiness which America promises to all its citizens.

Out of such a White House Conference should come a Proclamation of Equality from the President, in which the full authority and prestige of your office is placed in support of the moral principle of integration as well as in support of the legal concept of obedience to the Court. Such a conference would spell out for every American to understand those democratic principles that underlie the historic 1954 decision of the Supreme Court -- and which underlie our very existence as a nation. Such a conference, we believe, would also give heart to all Americans who recognize the basic justice of the Supreme Court decision and who see the need for the South to accommodate itself to it.

If we are to preserve the image of America as the champion of democratic rights, human dignity and the ethical teachings of our common religious tradition, it is essential that we restate our aspirations as a people -- especially in the midst of crisis.

The times call for moral leadership. Your effort to provide that leadership and to mobilize the nation in behalf of the moral principle of integration will command the support of all Americans.

Respectfully,

s/g Dr. Joachim Prinz
President

TELEGRAM

October 12, 1958

The President
The White House
Washington, D.C.

The American Jewish Congress warmly applauds your statement deploring the violence which erupted in Atlanta today when a group of vicious racist bigots calling themselves the Confederate Underground dynamited a Jewish house of worship. It is gratifying to know that every facility of our Federal government is being employed to track down the perpetrators of this attack.

The Atlanta outrage, coming on the heels of the bombing of Clinton High School in Tennessee and a series of actual and threatened acts of destruction against other religious and educational institutions in the South, emphasizes once again the need for the most vigorous action on your part, Mr. President, to mobilize the forces of decency and democracy in our country which are looking to you for leadership in support of the principles of equality and obedience to law which are the very foundations of our Republic.

In this hour of crisis, we urge you most respectfully, Mr. President, as we did in our letter to you of September 26th, to call a national White House Conference which would bring together leaders of religion, education, social welfare, business and labor and which would dramatically reaffirm the commitment of the American people to justice and to the lawful and peaceful resolution of differences -- differences which can exist only in a democratic society.

This moment in history calls for a Proclamation by the President spelling out for every American to understand our country's traditional abhorrence of the resort to violence and of incitement to racial and religious hatred, and articulating in clear and unequivocal terms our commitment to the profound truth that all men are equal in the sight of God.

Dear Rabbi Prinz:

Thank you for your telegram. I deeply deplore, as I have said publicly, the wanton bombing and destruction of houses of worship and I share your horror over the Atlanta incident.

The full facilities of the Federal government are being used to bring about the arrest of those people who are responsible for such regrettable incidents.

My associates and I will give your suggestion for the convening of a White House conference to consider this problem, as well as a special Governors' conference, careful consideration.

Dear Gus:

Thanks for your memo which came, back in mid-November. I referred it to our research staff before answering it - because of the chronology attached - and it has just come back to my desk.

I am not sure when I will next be in Dallas. I was in Houston on December 2, but unfortunately was only able to stay one day. The next time I come, I'll plan to stay an extra day and stop off in Dallas as well. That is, if the airlines strike is over by this time. I will advise you in advance.

I would hope that the Negro-white leadership group will begin meeting again on a fairly regular basis. Lines of communication remain open only so long as people meet.

There have been no new developments resulting from Fred Sweet's letter to Boris Shiskin. Mr. Sweet did call me and sent me a copy of his letter. The original dealt mostly with a desegregation schedule based upon the percentage of Negroes in the total population in each county. We suggested there were other criteria which were even more important. Hence the more comprehensive type of county profile development he suggests. The Florida Council on Human Relations has been advised of his suggestion, and Dade County is considering a pilot project of a voluntary desegregation which might at a later date be related to the schedule Sweet suggested.

All good regards.

Attached is a chronological summary of developments in Little Rock from October 14, 1958 to November 7, 1958 - 4 weeks. Similar reports will be compiled later.

I believe these records will give you a better understanding and perspective of the developments and trends in Little Rock and should serve to supplement the one prepared by the SRC.

Are you planning to be in this area soon? If so, would you please let me know in sufficient time so that I can arrange a conference for you with key persons. Our Negro-White Leadership group has not met since May. At that time I was appointed with Maceo Smith to draw up a draft of an ordinance for a Dallas Commission on Human Relations. I did this and sent a copy to Maceo in September, but no further action has been taken to date. I discussed the matter with Jerome Crossman and he appears to be interested in implementing this plan. I am keeping in touch with him about it.

The Dallas situation seems to be approaching a showdown and a decision will have to be reached shortly. We are watching and hoping that the transition will be without incident. During my last visit to Little Rock I spoke ~~with~~ to Harry Ashmore and Hugh Paterson. They seem to be terribly disturbed about the developments and will not hazard a guess about the future.

Harry Fleischman sent me a copy of a letter from Fred Sweet, Public Relations Director of the Hotel and Restaurant Employees International Union, to Boris Shishkin, Director, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department in Washington, in which he recommended a Florida project for a percolating desegregation program. He stated that the SRC was consulted on this matter. Has anything developed along these lines?

Regards.

Dear Gus:

Many thanks for your letter of the 26th and all the clippings. We were particularly happy to get the series on Integration in Texas from the Dallas Morning News. Certainly this paper has done an about face -- or perhaps three-fourths of an about face: from strongly pro-segregation to mildly pro-compliance. It's good to see this change for obviously it means that our power structure friends have "talked" to the publisher and editor, talked softly but carried a big stick.

Yes, we have been keeping abreast of developments in Little Rock. While it is hardly pleasant to have to go through this so often, we no longer worry about any responsible federal agency accepting the canards and distortions of J. B. Matthews. Of course, the segregationists make good propaganda use of it and the less sophisticated and the poorly informed swallow great gobs of it. There is something perverse about using the almost-sacred powers of state government for such cheap and tawdry purposes. It is obvious that those who scream "states rights" are the first to violate them when it suits their mean purposes.

I am planning a trip out to Texas after the first of the year, probably in February. I will let you know the exact date as soon as it is set and will plan to make it to Dallas, too.

Best wishes to you and Mrs. Falk in the up-coming year.

Dear Fred:

Thanks for your letter of December 16. I trust that your work will bring you in the vicinity of Dallas so that we can discuss developments in Dallas and the problems in activating the Leadership Group which held real promise last Spring. I seem to be the only one interested in implementing the program but unfortunately, time does not permit me to devote the necessary effort in furthering this important program. I believe that a visit by you would give the needed stimulation to convene the group again, at which time we could discuss future planning and activity.

Attached are several types of newspaper items which include a series of articles on integration in Texas, published by the Dallas Morning News, and developments in the Little Rock situation, especially the charges against the Arkansas Council on Human Relations by the Special Education Committee of the Arkansas Legislative Council. J. B. Matthews was a star paid witness for the State and he cited the Southern Regional Council as subversive and connected with the Arkansas Council on Human Relations. I know that you have all the details.

I plan to be in Little Rock shortly. If I can be of any service there, please call upon me.

It is interesting to note about the developments in Dade County. Please keep me advised of developments.

Best wishes for a very Happy New Year.

WILL MASLOW, General Counsel

December 19, 1958

Dear Colleagues:

On Monday of this week a decision was handed down by Judge Justine Wise Polier which is of such significance in the area of concern of CLSA that I feel that it should be brought to your attention in this letter although CLSA had no part in the legal proceedings in which the decision was rendered. As explained below, Judge Polier held that in the junior high schools of New York City the educational opportunities provided for children attending predominantly Negro-Puerto Rican junior high schools is inferior by reason of racial discrimination in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The case involved a proceeding in the New York City Children's Court instituted by the Board of Education of New York City against the parents of two Negro children, Charles Skipwith and Sheldon Rector, for their refusal to send them to junior high schools in Harlem. The charge against the parents was "neglect" of their children by reason of violation of the Compulsory Education Law. The parents admitted that they had refused to send their children to the schools. They did not claim that the private teaching for which they had arranged met the requirements of the New York Education Law.

In defense of their conduct, the parents of the children charged that the public schools involved were de facto racially segregated. As an additional defense, they urged that the schools in question had been discriminated against as the result of the assignment of a higher proportion of regularly licensed teachers to junior high schools whose school population was all white or predominantly white.

The Board of Education took the position that neither defense could be considered by the Children's Court since the parents had not appealed to the New York State Commissioner of Education for administrative redress. Judge Polier overruled this defense, h olding that the parents would be denied due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment if the Court found them guilty of neglect without affording them the opportunity of establishing that the schools to which their children would be compelled to attend were being conducted contrary to the guaranty of equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment.

On the merits of the defenses Judge Polier held that the defense of de facto segregation was not sustained—even though the two schools directly involved have a student population which is 100% Negro-Puerto-Rican—since there was no showing that the segregation was the result of any circumstances other than residential segregation which, in turn, was not the consequence of any action by any public authority. Judge Polier further pointed out that there is no evidence before the Court that the racial composition of junior high schools in New York is the product of gerrymandering of school districts, or of any policy or lack of policy of the Board of Education in establishing school districts, or in choosing school sites, or in assigning pupils to schools on the basis of race.

Judge Polier held that the second defense was fully sustained in view of the fact that the evidence furnished to the Court by the Board of Education upon the request of the Court, showed a consistent pattern in New York City of a higher percentage of substitute teachers being used in the 16 junior high schools whose pupil population is over 85% N egro-Puerto Rican, as compared with 52 junior high schools in which the pupil population is over 85% white. In the first category of schools 49.5 % of the teachers are substi tutes, whereas in the second category of schools the percentage is only 29.6%. Judge Polier further found that this discrimination in staffing of the junior high schools intensified the disadvantages under which the children in th e predominantly N egro-Puerto Rican schools w ere already placed by reason of the de facto segregation.

Judge Polier ruled that the Board of Education was responsible for the discriminatory staffing of the schools even though the Board had not made the assignments of regularly licensed teachers, but had allowed them to choose the schools in which they wished to teach, with the result that a disproportionate number of them chose to teach in non-N egro-Puerto Rican schools.

The following is an excerpt from the opinion of Judge Polier on this question:

> "That the Board of Education is entirely responsible for the existing discrimination in teacher assignments, there is, in my opinion, not the slightest doubt. What the Board did was to let the teachers themselves establish the discriminatory pattern. But this was action by the Board's employees, and action by employees who, as regularly licensed teachers, were subject to such assignments as th e Board chose to make. H aving put the power of assignment in the hands of teachers by default, as far as their choosing or not choosing to teach in an X school— a euph emism which nowise changes the fact of de facto school segregation-the Board is bound by the acts of its servants.

"Nor is this a question of niceties of the law of agency. T he assigning of teachers is the exercise of a governmental function. It is no less the exercise of such a role if performed by teachers, rather than an Assistant Superintendent of Education, or the Superintendent of Education, of the Board itself. The Board of Education of the City of New York can no more disclaim responsibility for what has occurred in this matter than the State of South Carolina could avoid responsibility for a Jim Crow State Democratic Party which the State dis everything possible to render "private" in character and operation. See Rice v. Elmore, 4 CIR., 165- F. 2d 387, certiorari denied 333 U. S. 875. See also both the majority and dissenting opinions in Dorsey v. Stuyvesant Town, 299 N. Y. 512, 532-533, 538-542.

"Where, as here, power and responsibility for teacher assignment rests in the Board of Education, teachers who exercise that power are in theapposite words of Mr. Justice Cardozo, "not acting in matters of merely private concern like the directors or agents of business corporations. They are acting in matters of high public interest, matters intimately connected with the capacity of government to exercise its functions."N ixon v . Condon 286 U. S. 73, 88."

Earlier in her opinion, Judge Polier had noted that even the studies conducted by the Board of Education following the decision of the Supreme Court in the school segregation case (Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483) had "specifically recommended that teacher assignment should be based on the needs of the schools rather than the preferences of teachers and principals." While noting that the Board of Education had, following those studies, exercised its power of assignment to the extent of assigning new ly licensed teachers to Negro-Puerto Rican schools, Justice Polier found that the Board had not exercised its authority in order to transfer to such schools experienced teachers w h o were regularly licensed. As a result it continued to be left to the principals of the junior high schools to seek, by their own efforts, to induce experienced teachers to join their staffs. In holding that the corrective action taken by the Board was insufficient, Judge Polier wrote as follows:

"No amount of individual skill or devotion of school principals can compensate for or eradicate the established pattern of discrimination in the assignment of regularly licensed teachers which has grown up over the years despite the fact that as long ago as 1896 the Supreme Court in Plessy v .Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, though sanctioning segregation, held that the Fourteenth Amendment requires "equal facilities." It should not have required Brown v. Board of Education,347 U. S. 483 in 1954 to alert the Board of Education of the City of New York to its constitutional responsibilities. At least by 1950 when Sweatt v. Painter, 399 U. S. 629, was decided by the Supreme Court, there was no excuse for thinking that the Fourteenth Amendment's constitutional command of "equal facilities" in education meant anything less than true equality.

"So long as non-w hite or X schools have a substantially smaller proportion of regularly licensed teachers than white or Y schools, discrimination and inferior education, apart from that inherent in residential patters, will continue. The Constitution requires equality, not merely palliatives.

"Y et the fact remains that more than eight years after the Supreme Court ruling in Sweatt v. Painter and more than four years after its ruling in Brown v. Board of Education the Board of Education of the City of New York has done substantially nothing to rectify a situation it should never have allowed to develop for which it is legally responsible, and with which it has had ample time to come to grips, even in the last four years.

"The Board of Education can no more plead not guilty than could the Police Commissioner if he allowed patrolmen to choose not to accept dangerous or unpleasant assignments. N o one would suppose that a new Police Commissioner would hav e performed his duty if he sought to remedy the situation by assigning police rookies to those tasks. Yet, in effect, that is all the Board of Education has done so far, in limiting the exercise of its power of assignment to the assignment of newly licensed teachers to the X schools."

Finally, Judge Polier observed that the issue before h er on the question of neglect was not how the Board of Education should go about correcting the unconstitutional condition which existed in the schools, but whether the Court should punish parents for refusing to submit their children to an existing unconstitutional condition in the public schools. H er opinion was as follows:

> "T o recur to a point earlier made, this Court is called upon to decide how soon the Board of Education could be directed to remedy what it has so long tolerated. Nor is it the function of this Court to say how the Board should go about effecting a change in the present lamentable situation, whether by compulsory assignments of veteran teachers to X schools for a period of years, by paying a special bonus to teachers to induce them to accept such assignments, or by providing additional services and facilities in such schools as, for example, additional administrative personnel, to make them more attractive to teachers now working in less difficult schools.
> "The course of this State will not excuse failure of performance of a constitutional duty because the City of New York might be unwilling to pay the bill for the costs of what needs to be done. Jaffe v. Board of Education, 265 N. Y. 160. See, also, O'Reilly v. Grumet, 284 App. Div. 440, affirmed 308 N. Y. 351. (Compare Borders v. Rippy, 5 Cir., 247 F. 2d 268, 272.) N or will they relieve the Board of Education of its duties because of "hardship upon the existing teaching force." Cf. David v. Board of Education, 263 App. Div. 369, 371, modified and affirmed 288 N. Y. 330. Those are educational problems which it is the business of the Board to deal with. Surely, they are less difficult of solution than those problems that have been faced and solved by Boards of Education- with the help of the teachers themselves and the encouragement and assistance of community leaders- in cities like Washington, D. C., Baltimore, Maryland and Louisville, Kentucky, which, since Brown v. Board of Education have changed from segregated to desegregated school systems. Here, as there, determination, resourcefulness and leadership can bring the situation in the New York City school system into line with the constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the laws. Until then, the Board of Education has no moral or legal right to ask that this Court shall punish parents or deprive them of custody of their children, for refusal to accept an unconstitutional condition which exists in the schools to which the Board h as assigned their children.

"These parents have the constitutionally guaranteed right to elect no education for their children rather than to subject them to discriminatorily inferior education. I am wholly satisfied from their testimony and demeanor that this is not a case where parents have chosen to make such a choice without regard to the welfare of their children. On the contrary, it is my impression that they are doing whatever is within their means to provide alternative education, though it may not meet the requirements of the Education Law. In my judgment, the course upon which th ey embarked, and which brought them before this Court, was undertaken for the sake of their children and for tens of thousands of other children like them who have been unfairly deprived of equal education."

The Board of Education has not yet decided whether it will appeal from Judge Polier's decision. It may well be that, if an appeal is taken, the case will ultimately reach the Supreme Court of the United States.

Ossining Creche Case. On Tuesday of this week Mr. Justice Gallagher of the N ew York Supreme Court in Westchester dismissed the suit brought to enjoin the erection of a Creche on the grounds of the Junior-Senior High School during the Christmas Season and for a judgment declaring such practice to be unconstitutional under the guarantees in the First and Fourteenth Amendments of freedom of religion and separation of church and state. The Court did not rule upon the legality of the events of the 1956 Christmas Season when the school board had allowed the Creche to be erected on the school grounds before the Christmas Season and maintained there after school had resumed. The Court held that since the Creche had been erected in 1957 after school had recessed and had been removed before school resumed, only that conduct practice could be considered in a suit brought in 1957.

As thus limited, the Court held that the facts did not constitute violation of constitutional principles, even though the Court found that, as contended by the objecting parents, the Creche w as a religious symbol. Judge Gallagher ruled that "the influence, if any, of religious symbolism is inescapable during the Christmas Season. It would be difficult to say that as a practical matter any greater influence exists by virtue of the fact that the symbol is permitted on public as well as private property.

As I have advised you before, the trial counsel for the objecting parents were Leo Pfeffer and Phil Baum of CLSA. An immediate appeal will be taken from the decision. Hopefully the matter can be carried through the New York Courts before the summer recess and if necessary argued in the Supreme Court of the United States before the 1959 Christmas Season.

ARAMCO. On Tuesday of this week, Will Maslow and I argued before Chairman Charles Abrams of the New York State Commission against Discrimination the application made by Congress for a reconsideration of the ruling a HEARING COMMISSIONER which had dismissed the action brought by Congress against American Arabian Oil Company because of its practice of interview ing job applicants as to their religion. The application of Congress for reconsideration was supported by the N AACP Legal and Educational Defense Fund and by the Urban League of Greater New York.

Chairman Abrams granted Congress two weeks in which to submit a brief in support of its contention that the Investigating Commissioner h ad acted in violation of the Constitution of the United States in holding that th e anti-discrimination policy of the State of N ew York could be set aside because the Department of State felt that a ban upon ARAMCOS practice of asking questions as to religion would prejudice the interests of the United States in Saudi Arabia, where ARAMCO conducts its field operations. At the time that the Congress submits its brief to Commissioner Abrams, I will further explain in my Letter the constitutional issues involved.

Sincerely yours,

Shad Polier

SUBJECT: Discriminatory Fraternities and State Colleges or Universities in California

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: January 23, 1959

DIGEST: A state college or university may not provide land, fraternity houses, administrative control or financial assistance to fraternities which restrict membership on the basis of race, creed or religion. Neither may it maintain control or regulation over such fraternities by supplying paid faculty advisors or other administrative direction. But where a state school simply permits students to become members of discriminatory fraternities, conferring no tangible benefits on such organizations, and leaving their supervision to parents or other persons outside the university (except for control over the conduct of the fraternity members as students) there is no basis for ruling that such a relationship is improper or invalid. Between these two extremes lies an area in which neither the U.S. Supreme Court nor the State courts have yet drawn a line defining permissible and impermissible state action.

On January 2, 1959, Governor Edmund G. Brown of California, as one of his last official acts as the outgoing Attorney General, ruled on a question put to him by nine California legislators. The question was whether it is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution or of the public policy of the State of California for a state college or university to grant official recognition to social or professional fraternities or sororities which restrict their membership on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin.

The Attorney General's opinion first pointed out that the term "official recognition" is difficult to define since there is "no typical relationship" between the fraternities on the one hand and the state institutions on the other. At some schools fraternity houses are located on the campus, are owned by the school and leased to the fraternities. In many cases, fraternities are given the use of campus buildings and facilities, while other types of student organizations and non-student groups are denied such use. In some instances, faculty members serve as advisor to fraternities and to inter-fraternity organizations. In others they do not. The ruling states that in nearly all cases where fraternities are not banned by the institution, school administrations exercise relatively strict controls over the behavior of the students by regulating not only the fraternities but also certain other persons or organizations providing living accommodations. Minimum scholarship requirements may be imposed on fraternity members by the schools. Proper conduct at social events and initiation ceremonies is generally required. Often fraternities must file with the school administration lists of members and officers.

After acknowledging that for years, many, if not most, fraternities restricted membership in some manner on the basis of race, color, religion or national origin, the ruling points out that branches of the fraternities on the campuses of the state colleges and universities no longer have express racial or religious restrictions set forth in their charters or constitutions. The ruling adds that most schools and universities in California "appear to be exerting their influence against restrictions on the basis of race, or religion" and in "actual practice, as well as in the charters, racial and religious barriers seem to be crumbling in the fraternities at California schools."

The ruling then reviews the numerous court decisions on racial discrimination and the existing California statutes aimed at insuring racial and religious equality. The Attorney General cites decisions holding that on the basis of the fundamental authority of the schools over the students, fraternities may be banned from colleges and universities or may be subjected to strict control by them. It is also well established that a university or college may refuse recognition to any fraternity which restricts its membership on the basis of race or religion.

After pointing out that fraternities are not public organizations but retain separate, private identities, the ruling states that the question presented is whether, consistent with the equal protection clause of the United States Constitution and the public policy of the State of California, a state school may create relationships with, permit use of public property by, give financial and other aid to, and exercise direct regulation and control over private organizations which restrict membership on racial or religious grounds. It concludes on this question that if a state university supplies land or fraternity houses on campus, maintains strict control and regulation over fraternities, supplies paid faculty advisors, or other administrative or financial assistance, there is little doubt that such a relationship with fraternities which restrict membership on the basis of race, color, creed, or religion would be invalid as against public policy and as a denial of the equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The ruling goes on to state that if a state university or college in recognizing or approving the existence of fraternities merely permits students to become members of such organizations, conferring no tangible benefits, and leaving the supervision with the parents or other persons outside the university, except for control over the conduct of the fraternity members as students, the relationship of the state university or college with the fraternity would not be violative of the United States Constitution or of public policy. Finally, the ruling states that between these two extremes, the present nature of the cases makes it impossible to determine where the line might ultimately be drawn.

The formal conclusion reached by the outgoing Attorney General is as follows:

> "The types of relationships which are possible or exist between fraternities and sororities on one hand and the state universities and colleges in California on the other are almost unlimited in number. Certain relationships which are possible or exist between the state schools of higher education and the fraternities and sororities which restrict their membership on the basis of race would clearly be unconstitutional under the United States Constitution and also would be against the public policy of the State of California. On the other hand, other possible or existing relationships between state universities and colleges and fraternities and sororities restricting membership on the basis of race, religion, color, or national origin would be constitutional. The conclusions and analysis of this opinion do not affect the right of lodges, churches, and other private organizations unconnected with the State to restrict their memberships on the basis of race and religion."

SUBJECT: Santa Fe, New Mexico, Civil Rights Ordinance

FROM: Paul Hartman and Theodore Leskes

DATE: January 28, 1959

DIGEST: The Santa Fe, New Mexico, City Council adopts an enforceable ordinance barring discrimination in places of public accommodation, resort or amusement.

On December 17, 1958 the City Council of Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico, adopted a civil rights ordinance.

The measure, which is similar to an ordinance adopted in Albuquerque, New Mexico, in 1952, starts with a declaration of policy against discrimination in places of public accommodation, resort or amusement on the grounds of race, color, religion, ancestry or national origin. The ordinance declares the right to the full and equal accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges of any such place within the city of Santa Fe to be a civil right.

The ordinance makes it unlawful to bar any person from a place of public accommodation because of race, color, religion, ancestry or national origin or to publish or mail discriminatory notices or advertisements. Among the places of public accommodation, resort or amusement covered are hotels, motels, tourist courts, restaurants, barrooms, swimming pools, bath houses, and all public conveyances.

Violation of the ordinance is punishable by a fine of from $100 to $300 or imprisonment of from 30 to 90 days. The ordinance also provides for revocation of any city license granted to a place of public accommodation if its owner or operator is convicted of two or more violations within a year.

Comment

In 1955 the Legislature of New Mexico passed, and the Governor signed, a civil rights act prohibiting discrimination in places of public accommodation on a statewide basis. However, enforcement provisions similar to those contained in the Santa Fe ordinance were eliminated from the state bill before final passage. Hence, only the cities of Albuquerque and Santa Fe, New Mexico, have statutory machinery to enforce the ban on discrimination in places of public accommodation, spelled out in the state law of 1955.

Keep Them Open !

An Editorial

WE STAND AT THE BRINK

Pressures and tensions are rising. The great sea of emotions, which surrounds the issue of integration within our public schools, is reaching the flood stage. Only a dam of intelligent thinking, planning and action can stem the tide.

And, from where we sit, the coming session of the State Legislature, perhaps the most critical session in the history of Florida, may not hold back the torrent. This is an emergency!

We stand at the brink.

Ever since the Supreme Court handed down its decision, the South has been in a dither. The rapidity of court orders has thrown the South into a series of fitful acts. Some have been lawful, some have not. The crusaders for "white supremecy" have had a field day. Those who have accepted the orders intelligently have been heard, too.

Now, the people of Florida must face up to the issue of integration. As a result of many things already etched in history, the school board in Dade County has announced that Orchard Villa, a northwest elementary school, will be opened next fall to children of both races.

At this writing, the "wool hat gang" that has controlled the State Legislature up until now has said that no public school in the State will be integrated. On the other hand, the local leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People have said that they will not rest with only Orchard Villa's being integrated - they have announced that they will appear before the school board with the intent of having many of Dade's schools integrated this year.

Where this give and take will end, no one can be sure. However, the role of the American Jewish Committee has been fairly well outlined.

Looking at AJC, we see an organization that leans toward a moderate liberal view. With all due deferrence to former Governor Millard Caldwell, we take this moderate stand. The ex-chief executive of our State has said that "moderation" has fallen into the hands of those who are in favor of a "do nothing" attitude; he has also said that others who claim to be moderates have swung too far to the left.

To our way of thinking, AJC, as a liberal-moderate group, has established itself as a force that is badly needed in this era of heated emotions and unsound actions.

AJC is attempting to present all the facts to its members and, through them, to the community. AJC does not say "do this" or "don't do that". Rather, it is serving as an educational stimulus and as a sounding board.

Through it, we are all better prepared to face the emergency that is upon us. We owe our debt to the leaders of AJC who are steering this course. We also owe our debt to those who are now taking the lead in helping to stem the tide of undemocratic actions that have been offered as an illegal substitute to the "law of the land".

We stand at the brink of either a bright new adventure in human relations or a period of dark days for all the peoples of Florida. Each of us must determine his own role in this chapter of history. Each of us should, before assuming this role, drink up the knowledge that AJC affords us and then find our individual niche in the human drama which is now being unfolded.

Let it never be said that we entered this period blindly. The American Jewish Committee is like a beacon in the fog of misunderstanding, shedding light wherever it swings.

If we, as individuals, don't take advantage of AJC, if we don't give credit to AJC for its service in this moment of coming-to-grips with ourselves, if we don't get others involved in this particular phase of AJC activity, we should have our collective head examined.

Closing Schools Is No Solution

CLOSING public schools would be tragic and unnecessary. In the long run it must prove unacceptable to a great majority of our people if they fully understand the factors involved.

That, in sum, is what Assistant Attorney General Ralph E. Odum told educators yesterday in Tampa.

It is a stand which thoughtful persons can well accept.

Mr. Odum was discussing the parent option plan sponsored by Attorney General Richard Ervin and State School Superintendent Thomas D. Bailey. The assistant attorney general said he could not "guarantee" legality of the device to avoid cumpulsory attendance in integrated schools.

Under parent option children would not be allowed to enroll in private schools at state expense unless the school they were attending was integrated. Then parents, both white and Negro, might ask for transfer of their children to segregated schools.

Denial of the transfer requests would permit withdrawal of the students from integrated schools and enrollment in private schools with the parents receiving a state payment of about $30 a month for tuition.

IF MR. ODUM has doubts about the legality of this device, he also must hold serious reservations about another which Mr. Bailey predicted will be introduced in the Legislature next month.

Aimed directly at Dade County, it would require a referendum on closing of all schools in any county where a single school is integrated.

Calmness has prevailed here since the School Board voluntarily agreed to enrollment of four Negro pupils in Orchard Villa Elementary School next fall. This is to the credit of both sides.

But a referendum campaign would be bound to generate bitterness and, perhaps, something worse.

Even so, the prospect is remote that any court would sustain a move permitting the people of a community to vote on whether they will obey what has been proclaimed "the law of the land."

There may be answers. But closing the schools is not one of them. Florida cannot prosper spiritually or materially by stunting the minds of its children.

The above appeared in the March 20th issue of the MIAMI HERALD. We can only hope that it will calm those who are prepared to act within the confines of their communities and those who serve in the State Legislature.

And, we call to your attention the following, which was in the March FLORIDA PARENT-TEACHER that is published by the Florida Congress of Parents and Teachers:

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Somehow, someway, I would like to talk individually with every single P.T.A. member this spring. I would like to say to you, "What do you believe?" "What do you want for your children?" "Do you want to preserve the American pattern of public education for all who are educable?" "Do you believe that education is the business of the state, rather than the church?" And then I would like us to pause and to do some very serious thinking, and to say that although one's emotions might lead us down one path, one's considered reasoning might lead us down another, and that our decision must be reached after we have considered what will ultimately be the greatest benefit to our children.

These are momentous times. We have very immediate local problems to face. In addition, we have very serious national problems confronting us. You and I are caught in a local situation at a time when our nation is caught in such momentous stress it may not survive. Is this, then, a time to say our children can be educated in some makeshift way? Or a time to flaunt the right of a state in the face of the Mother Nation?

If I were to speak with you personally, I would remind you that we who are the average homeloving, P.T.A. members stand a chance of losing our public schools for the children of Florida because we cannot arouse ourselves enough to interpret our desires to the members of the state legislature. Instead, we stand silent while the agitators are heard. The members of the legislature attempt to provide the laws we desire. You have gone on record as, "Believing a system of free public schools under state and local controls is vital to a democratic society." Do not let your delegation leave for Tallahassee without understanding this clearly!

SEYMOUR SAMET COMMENTS ON THE SOUTH

Marking the tenth anniversary of his work as a professional AJC leader, Seymour Samet, our highly regarded Area Director, addressed a recent meeting of the Executive Board. As usual, his observations were profound. We know that all the membership will want to be aware of what he sees around him as he looks at the South.

Believing that the last decade has been the most important one in the field of human rights since the adoption of the Bill of Rights, Seymour is both impressed and depressed. While he is encouraged by the activities of Southerners, such as those who are taking an active part in AJC projects, he finds too many who are living in fear, ignorance and apathy.

He says that up until now, the liberal element was always ready to act as a mediator. Now, there are two extremes in the South; i.e., those who are militant and those who "do not want to get involved".

Unfortunately, he says that he has found that from an area where one might expect the strongest positions, the majority group no longer takes a stand. As a result, the South is giving way to a new breed of American Fascists who are filling the power vacuum.

To illustrate the point, Seymour called our attention to Montgomery, Alabama, where the White Citizens Council has literally taken over the town. All the key municipal officials are members of the Council which has announced that it "is the organized voice of Montgomery." It demands that it be consulted by the city council in all matters of importance. Further, it has said that all citizens who either speak or write in opposition to total segregation will be socially, politically and economically boycotted.

In the face of this, the majority is unwilling or unable to bring itself to the point of defying such edicts.

To counter this cancer which is growing throughout the South, Seymour says that we must use our sophisticated intelligence, native ability, and money in waging this vital fight for human rights survival in the South.

Local And National Leaders Meet

FLIGHT OF RUMANIAN JEWS

Only a few weeks ago, leaders of Greater Miami Jewry met to pledge their support to the Combined Jewish Appeal which, among other things this year, is attempting to raise a considerable amount of EXTRA funds to aid in the rehabilitation of thousands of Rumanian who have been set free from behind the Iron Curtain.

Our AJC chapter was represented by Col. Nathan B. Rood and Seymour Samet.

Meanwhile, on a national level, four hundred Jewish leaders, representing 19 major national Jewish organizations, met in emergency conference and urged the American Jewish community to rise to the "historic opportunity" afforded by the "great emigration of Jews from Eastern Europe" and make it "one of the momentous developments in contemporary Jewish history."

Among the convening organizations was the American Jewish Committee whose delegates joined in the adoption of a declaration calling upon all national organizations to support the drive of the United Jewish Appeal and to "give encouragement and help to every local community" in order to raise maximum funds.

Leaders of these oganizations heard eye-witness accounts of the unexpected influx of Rumanian Jews into Israel.

"This is no haphazard emigration," declared Rabbi Herbert Friedman of the United Jewish Appeal. "Costs of transporting immigrants and getting them settled in Israel amount to a staggering 12 to 15 - million dollars a month" the UJA official reported.

A Special Emergency Fund of one hundred million dollars over and above its regular campaign is required by UJA to finance the transport and resettlement of an unexpected 100,000 Eastern European immigrants this year.

Irving M. Engel, National President of the American Jewish Committee, in a memo to the National Executive Board, stated, "We are deeply cognizant of the immense burden which the people of Israel are voluntarily assuming in receiving the large numbers of fellow Jews who are now on their way to Israel. We recognize the necessity and the obligation of doing the utmost, in every way possible, to alleviate that burden and to mitigate the need for the great sacrifices which Israel is so willing to make in this emergency. With the other American Jewish organizations here represented, each exerting every effort according to its particular function and its ability to serve, we are prepared to do everything within our power to meet the challenge."

There will be a Workshop on European Affairs on May 13th when Zachariah Shuster, European Director of the American Jewish Committee, will be the key speaker.

NEW GROUP FORMED

A discussion group met for the first time recently at the home of Mr. and Mrs. William Gladstone. They were most fortunate in having as their discussion leader, Mr. Manheim Shapiro, National Director of Jewish Communal Affairs, AJC. The group discussed the challenging subject "Jewishness - A Problem or Pleasure."

AJC AND THE FEDERATION

David Fleeman, Harold Spaet, Nat Rood and Seymour Samet appeared March 11th on behalf of our Chapter at a special meeting of the Greater Miami Jewish Federation sub-committee on Community Relations, to discuss the AJC's national and local program purposes. This meeting was one of a series of meetings that the Federation is holding with agency representatives in order to consider Federation's responsibilities in relation to these agencies.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE FORMED

Mrs. Louis Rogel has accepted the Chairmanship of our Library Committee. We have a highly specialized library. If you have an interest in reading literature and current pamphlets, you can be a great help to our Library Committee. Please contact Mrs. Louis (Lee) Rogel (MO 6-0802).

David Danzig, National Program Director of the American Jewish Committee and a member of the American Council of the International University, spoke before members of our chapter on Wednesday, March 18th, at a luncheon meeting sponsored by the International Affairs Committee of A.J.C. at the DuPont Plaza Hotel. In his talk on "Catholic-Jewish Relationships", Mr. Danzig gave an excellent picture of new trends and influences which are beginning to affect the Catholic world.

Mr. Danzig has the distinction of having lectured on "Church and State" at the International University of Rome where a program is being developed to promote a "richer current of social cultural cooperation between America and Europe."

As a member of the American Council of the International University, he is much involved with the development of the "Pro Deo" program, a program which is promoting "Democracy Under God."

Are You Participating?

Home Discussion Groups Booming

Are you a member of a home discussion group? If you aren't, please call Mrs. Nat Rood at HI 3-1470, who will be happy to tell you about the group nearest your home.

Of discussion groups, Mrs. Charles Silleto of Des Moines wrote in ADULT LEADERSHIP: "This kind of program is a great benefit to the individual. Members don't move mountains. It creates a terrific interest in the world about you. It helps to approach problems more constructively. There is strength in a large number of discussion groups in a community.

"The home discussion group promotes individual thinking and the practice of self government."

One of A Series

WE BELIEVE

(In commenting on "hate" literature, the editors of the NEW YORK TIMES made a point that we should all consider).

"We are jealous of the right to print and publish and distribute expressions of free opinion. But, as an eminent justice of our Supreme Court once pointed out, the right of free speech does not permit a person to raise a false cry of "Fire" in a crowded theatre. The legal ground upon which the hate-mongers can be met is complicated and occasionally tricky. For this reason, there must be more, and more careful, study of how to meet what is obvious danger to our freedom, our social dignity and our community self respect."

For Those Who Missed It

Shapiro Stimulates Group

Manheim Shapiro, Director of the Department of Jewish Communal Affairs of the AJC, provided an exhilarating intellectual cordial for the after-dinner meeting of the Executive Committee and their member-guests last month.

He spoke on the subject "A Jew Looks At Himself," offering a fresh perspective to this rather jaded topic. He pointed out that it is no longer enough for the Jew to face outward to a non-Jewish world, but rather to begin to reflect more maturely on his own role as a Jew, utilizing the cultural and spiritual reservoirs inherent in Judaism. He explained clearly why a community relations organization such as AJC must be concerned at least as much with Jewish as with non-Jewish attitudes and touched upon the various techniques utilized in modern community relations research.

The essence of his message, however, revolved about five quandaries for the American Jew:

1. What is the meaning of being Jewish? Most American Jews are Jews by default only and not because they realize any positive value from Judaism. He attributes this to inadequate and inappropriate Jewish education, inappropriate in that it is too much oriented towards the long, sad saga of persecution, and insufficiently towards the contributions and cultures of Judaism.

2. What should the American Jew do to support Jewishness? He pointed out the need for a diverse Jewish society - with many expressions and feelings all eminating ideally from a well-spring of basic Jewishness.

3. What should our relation to Jews elsewhere be? Briefly, to cultivate feelings and opinions about Jews in Israel and other parts of the world based upon factual and intelligent observation rather than emotional reactions.

4. What is the role of the Jew in general society? Jews may be too secular in their community activities and too restrictive in their charitable donations.

5. What shall the Jew expect of his Christian neighbor? According to available statistics, American Jews add too much mortar to the wall which still separates us from our Christian neighbors. We expect more anti-Semitism than we might actually find on unbiased inspection.

groups who have been concerned with the ways of "Keeping Our Schools Open", have been Mr. and Mrs. Al Elkins, Mr. and Mrs. Al Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Mort Halpern and Mr. and Mrs. Art Horovitz.

....Mrs. Floy W. Mussett, past president of the State PTA, has written: "The coming session of the State Legislature will be faced with many problems. One such problem will be the future of Florida's public schools. The Florida Congress of Parents and Teachers believes that a strong public school system is fundamental to the well-being of our State and that no issue, however critical, should prevent our wholehearted support and maintenance of free public schools."

....The AJC's Education Committee has decided to act as a catalyst for other community agencies in an effort to awaken the citizenry and make it aware of what COULD and MAY happen here to our public school system. Mrs. Charles Finkelstein, chairman of the committee invites your membership and asks that you call her at HI 3-5433.

....In the wake of fast-moving events preceding the session of the Legislature, Miami's PTA's are still organizations such as the League of Women Voters remain silent.

....The American Jewish Committee believes that it is to the best interest of all citizens of the United States to uphold the decision of the Supreme Court, which requires all public schools to be desegregated. The AJC is likewise vitally concerned with the preservation of the public school system.

CROMMELIN TRIES TO WIN MAYORALTY

In a three-way primary race for mayor of Montgomery, Ala., held March 16, retired Admiral John G. Crommelin polled 1,760 votes out of 17,330 -- a little better than 10 per cent of the total. In the ensuing run-off election, the incumbent, Mayor W. A. Gayle, was defeated by Earl James by a scant margin of about 700 votes.

The recent primary results indicate a significant gain for the indefatigable anti-Semitic candidate, at least in the city of Montgomery. Last year, Crommelin had polled only 169 votes out of almost 23,000 cast in Montgomery County during the gubernatorial primaries; statewide, he polled a mere 2,200 votes out of the total of 618,000, less than one-half of 1 per cent.

Crommelin had bid for political power in 1956 also. Some observers discount the 1956 vote in assessing Crommelin's political career as a bigot, because at that time he was regarded more as a naval hero than an anti-Semitic propagandist, even though he had made several bigoted speeches on radio and TV. In 1956, when he opposed Lister Hill for the Senatorial nomination, Crommelin garnered about 30 per cent of the primary votes -- 112,000 to Hill's 240,000.

FREETHOUGHT MAGAZINE ADDS RACIAL HATRED TO ITS PHILOSOPHY

The Truth Seeker, founded in 1873 and described as the "oldest free-thought paper in the world," has long been devoted to promoting atheism and rationalism. During the past several years, outright racism has been added to its line -- reflecting an alliance between the Truth Seeker's editor, Charles Smith, and James H. Madole, leader of the neo-Nazi National Renaissance Party in New York City. During 1958, Smith and Madole jointly headed a group known as the "Racist Forum," holding periodic meetings to air their fanatic ideas.

The March 1959 issue of Truth Seeker features an article by Smith, "Love Mongers and Love Sheets," which attacks proponents of "Blind Brotherly Love." Identifying himself as "publisher of what these mad Lovers call a Hate Sheet," Smith argues that "the Negro is increasing his percentage of the population through greater fertility -- protected by anti-discrimination propaganda directed mainly by Communistic Jews."

Also in this issue is "A Racist Lecture at a Baptist College" by Eustace Mullins, a long-standing writer for Conde McGinley, Madole and other anti-Semitic publicists. "Why the Jew is Hated" is the March installment of a series by Patricia Schuyler.

IN BRIEF

The North Carolina Supreme Court has ruled that the Rev. James W. Cole,

Ku Klux Klan leader, must serve a prison term for inciting an Indian riot last year. Cole, who has since resigned from the Klan, had been previously sentenced to eight months to two years shortly after Lumbee Indians broke up a Klan rally near Maxton with gunfire.... Rebel Records of Nashville, Tenn., is distributing four "Songs of the South" by Henson Nelson, described in the firm's literature as one of the defendants who had been acquitted in the 1957 Clinton, Tenn., case. Nelson was charged with violation of a Federal Court injunction for obstructing the Court's order directing integration of the Clinton High School. Nelson's "country-style" tunes, recorded on two 45-rpm disks, are: "The Clinton Song," "Difficult & Defeated," "Hey Dixie!" and "I Like Ike!" .... The American Mercury, published by industrialist Russell Maguire, augments its anti-Semitic output with its May issue which charges: "When the international bankers and department store owners wined and dined Mr. A. Mikoyan on his recent visit to the U.S., they gave additional proof of what Mercury has been telling you, namely, that the money changers finance Communism, Marxism, Zionism, Wars and Revolutions." Reprints of a Mercury article attacking fluoridation are currently being widely distributed among dentists.... Merwin K. Hart, in his March 15 Economic Council Letter, attacks columnist Joseph Alsop for denouncing the Protocols of Zion as a fraud and a forgery. (One would suppose that the important thing about the Protocols is not... their possible lack of authenticity, but rather whether they are a prophecy...now being fulfilled," Hart writes. "And most informed Americans would consider them a very accurate prophecy indeed." ..."The Secret World Government, or, 'The Hidden Hand,'" a 200-page diatribe on "The Jewish Peril" by Maj.-Gen., Count Cherep-Spiridovich, has made a new appearance. Originally published in 1926, the new edition is being sold for $5 by The Revere of Hinsdale, Ill., and Women's Voice of Chicago. Conde McGinley, always out for a volume business, is undercutting by offering the same book for $3.... The March 1 issue of Common Sense devotes more than two pages to "Right Wing Patriot on the Air" — alleged excerpts from a December broadcast of WOR's all-night "Long John" show, which included an interview with Benjamin H. Freedman.

Funds for the activities of the American Jewish Committee

Dear Haskell:

First, I want to be sure you understand the relationship between SRC and the Florida Council on Human Relations. Until about two years ago the Florida Council was affiliated with SRC; at that time, however, all of the state councils became independent. We continue to have a cooperative relationship, and SRC still provides some financial aid. One of the conditions of this aid is that the state organizations carry on program consistent with tax-exemption, including the prohibition on political activity. The Dade County Council is an affiliate of the Florida Council and, so long as this is true, the same conditions must apply to it, if SRC is to give financial assistance to the Florida Council.

The non-political requirement has been construed by our legal counsel to mean that no specific legislation or political candidate may be supported or opposed. Thus the organization may advocate preservation of public schools, compliance with desegregation rulings, or what not, but may not advocate passage or defeat of H.B. 127 or S.B. 426. So, the answer to your first question is that the Florida Council may not urge its members to work against school-closing legislation. Groups that are tax-exempt because of their religious nature may enjoy more leeway, but "educational" organizations -- and particularly those without strong political influence -- have to toe the line.

As to your second question, it is our understanding that the Florida Council is committed to orderly desegregation. Our financial aid is not based on any condition that this policy be publicly reaffirmed at any given intervals. The important thing, from our point of view, is whether the program activities are directed toward, and consistent with, that objective. We expect and allow for wide latitude on the part of the leadership of the various state councils in formulating program and strategy. What is meaningful program in Kentucky may not be realistic in Alabama. I should think that the position of the Florida Council would be clearly in favor of desegregation, and that is what I'm given to understand. Given that commitment, however, it doesn't necessarily follow that advocacy on moral grounds should be the only -- or even the main -- public emphasis. The question is, what will be most effective?

Thirdly, the Florida Council and its affiliates can, separately or jointly with others, call on public officials to desegregate the public schools -- so long as no specific legislation is urged or opposed. There is no difference that I know of between unilateral action by the organization and action taken in conjunction with others.

I would welcome an opportunity to discuss the Dade County situation (and the Florida Council's role) with you in person, and I hope we can do that when we are together next. Meanwhile, however, rather than my calling, I think it would mean more if Paul Rilling (who is replacing Fred Routh on July 1) could visit Miami and talk with you and others there about these problems. Paul will be handling relations with the state councils, as well as field activities in general, and could give the matter more detailed attention and follow-through than I can at this point.

If you feel that this is too critical a situation to wait until Paul is on the job, please give me a call collect.

All the best.

Harold

Dear Harold:

I would appreciate it very much if you could clarify to what extent the Florida Human Relations Council and/or the Dade County Council may become involved in opposing the legislative efforts to close the schools.

For example, may the Florida Council send communications to its membership alerting them to certain school bills which are pending and suggesting that they contact their legislators and write letters, etc., so that the measures may not pass and so that the schools may not be closed?

Secondly, what responsibility does the Florida and Dade County Councils have to continually take public positions in favor of desegregation and to oppose segregation?

Thirdly, may the Dade County Council or the Florida Council join with other agencies in endorsing a resolution calling upon the legislature and the governor to obey the law of the land and desegregate the public schools? Is this also to be contrued as legislative activity? Is there a difference between individual action on the part of the Councils and joining with other groups as a subsidiary signatory?

The above questions are prompted because of a number of instances which have disturbed me no little. There is no point in going into the details in a letter, but if you would care to call me, or if you would like to discuss this matter in person, I would like to do so the next time I'm in Atlanta.

Dear Friend:

I am pleased to enclose a reprint of an article on church-state relations as they affect the Jewish community in the United States that appeared in the Jewish Journal of Sociology published in behalf of the World Jewish Congress in April, 1959.

This article is the text of an address delivered by Shad Polier on January 15, at the Conference of Jewish organizations held in London.

Cordially yours,

Leo Pfeffer

OBSERVATIONS ON CHURCH-STATE PROBLEMS IN AMERICA AND THE INTEREST OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMUNITY

Shad Polier

INTRODUCTION

The newly approved Constitution of the Fifth French Republic declares, as its predecessor, that France is a laic or secular state. The American Constitution makes no similar declaration but achieves the same result by withholding from the central government any power to deal with religious affairs. This withholding, which is paralleled in the constitutions of all the individual states is, in any event, binding on the individual states under the Federal Constitution as interpreted by the Federal Supreme Court. For in the United States the ultimate determination of such political issues as the relationship of the individual states to the central government and the relationship of both the central government and the state governments to the citizens of the nation is a judicial matter for the courts generally and for the Federal Supreme Court in particular.

The framers of the Federal Constitution in 1787 contemplated that the general government would be secular. They manifested this, however, more by what they did not say than what they did. They simply refrained from conferring upon that government any power to deal with religious affairs. Indeed, they carefully refrained from even mentioning God in the Constitution. The only express reference to religion included in the text was a mandate that no religious tests should ever be required for service in the government, a prohibition which meant that not merely Roman Catholics or Jews but even atheists could legally be elected to the presidency of this overwhelmingly Protestant nation.

This negative inference was made express some four years after the Constitution was adopted. In 1791 a Bill of Rights was added to the Constitution. Its opening words were: 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.' This provision was really little more than a formal statement of what the great pamphleteer and fighter for liberty, Tom Paine, had said in Common Sense some fifteen years earlier: 'As to religion, I hold it to be the indispensable duty of government to protect all conscientious professors thereof, and I know of no other business which government hath to do therewith.'

In 1947 and again in 1948 the Supreme Court spelled out in some detail what the Constitutional provision meant. This is the most authoritative exposition which we have and therefore merits quotation in full. The Court said:

> The 'establishment of religion' clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state nor the Federal Government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. Neither can force nor influence a person to go to or remain away from church against his will or force him to profess a disbelief or disbelief in any religion. No person can be punished for entertaining or professing religious beliefs or disbeliefs, for church attendance or non-attendance. No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion. Neither a state nor the Federal Government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa. In the words of Jefferson, 'the clause against establishment of religion by law was intended to erect a wall of separation between church and State' (Mr. Justice Black, Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S.1, 15-16).

In short, the United States Constitution imposes upon our governments, Federal and state, an obligation of neutrality -- not merely neutrality as among competing faiths and sects, but also a neutrality as between religion and non-religion.

How has this legal 'wall of separation' affected the Jewish community and Jewish rights in the United States? Before I offer an overall general answer to the question, I think it advisable to consider the operation of the principle of separation of church and state in six specific areas which particularly concern the Jewish community. These are: (1) the role of religion in public education; (2) governmental financial support of private religious education; (3) governmental supervision and control of private religious education; (4) the exclusion of religious schools and houses of worship from particular communities or particular districts within a community; (5) compulsory Sunday observance laws; (6) humane slaughtering legislation.

RELIGION IN PUBLIC EDUCATION

Religious instruction in state schools is found in the overwhelming majority of countries throughout the world. Indeed, it is found even in some Communist countries -- such as Poland and Hungary -- not withstanding the orthodox Marxist doctrine that looks at religion as an evil to be eradicated.

In the United States the state schools -- known as public schools -- originally developed out of Protestant religious schools. Even they were taken over by the state and local civil authorities shortly after the founding of the Republic towards the end of the eighteenth century, they still retained their Protestant orientation. However, during the second quarter of the nineteenth century they began to be transformed into secular schools. This came about as a result of a number of factors, the two most important being the general secularization of American society on the one hand, and on the other the increasing influx of Roman Catholics, particularly from Ireland. Both groups, the secularists and the Roman Catholics, fought against Protestant teachings in the public schools.

Surprisingly, the struggle was a comparatively short one. In less than a score of years after it was launched it achieved success with the general acceptance of the principle that the public schools should be non-sectarian. By the end of the third quarter of the nineteenth century there was hardly a state which did not by its laws or constitutional provisions require that the public schools be completely non-sectarian.

Nevertheless, religious instruction did continue in some public schools. In some communities the continuance was justified on the ground that since the instruction was not compulsory, and Catholic and Jewish children could be excused from participating if their parents requested it, the non-sectarianism of the school was not violated. In others, an effort at fairness was made by opening the schools to Catholic and Jewish teaching as well; by permitting each of the three major faiths to conduct classes for their children in the public schools, it was felt that there could be no legitimate complaint.

In 1948 the legality of the latter system was presented to the United States Supreme Court for consideration. A community in the mid-west had inaugurated a programme under which one day each week the children in the public schools were divided into three groups, Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish, and each group was taught its respective religion by a minister, priest, or rabbi. (After the programme had been in effect for a short time, the local Jewish community decided to give it up, so that thereafter only Protestant and Catholic instruction was given.) Technically, attendance was not compulsory and if a parent wished his child to have no religious education, he could so indicate to the authorities and the child would be excused from attending. However, as a matter of fact, very few parents exercised this option.

The Supreme Court in 1948 declared the programme unconstitutional. In effect, the Court held that it is not enough for the public schools to be multi-sectarian; they must be non-sectarian, or, perhaps more accurately, they must be secular. And it makes no difference whether the religious instruction is compulsory or voluntary; it may not be conducted within the public schools under the auspices of the school authorities.

This decision was hailed by the entire Jewish community. Indeed, when the case was before the Court, all the leading American Jewish organizations, religious and secular, presented a brief to the Court urging it to declare the programme unconstitutional. On the other hand, the Catholic Church and perhaps the majority of the Protestant denominations attacked the decision, declaring that its effect was anti-religious. For the past decade most of the Christian religious organizations in the United States have been waging a campaign to bring religion back to the public schools. Opposing them are most of the secular organizations concerned with public education or with civil liberties and practically the whole of the Jewish community. (It should not, however, be supposed that the Christian community is united on the question; there is a significant number of Protestant -- though no Catholic -- organizations that strongly believe in the continued secularity of public education.)

It would be hardly accurate to suggest that American public schools are completely devoid of religious content or atmosphere. Notwithstanding the Supreme Court's decision, one can find some religious practices in most public schools. There are thousands of public schools throughout the nation, and there is no practicable way to police them all so as to assure their abiding by the Court's decision. Hence, while out and out religious instruction in public schools is rare, lesser religious observances are by no means uncommon. For example, recitation of a prayer is a frequent practice. In schools where there are a substantial number of Jewish children, non-Christological prayers are chosen; but even here, the 'Lord's Prayer', taken from the New Testament, is often included on the assumption that it is non-sectarian since it does not mention Jesus. So too, it is a common practice in many communities to read several verses from the Bible daily. Here too, in schools where there is a substantial number of Jewish children, it is the usual practice to select verses from the Old Testament -- generally Psalms. The singing of hymns, particularly during the Christmas season, is likewise a widespread practice. All in all, however, it may fairly be said that the American public school is a secular school, at least in comparison with state schools in most other parts of the world.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORT OF PRIVATE RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

The United States, too, is one of the few nations where tax-raised funds are not used in direct support of religious practices or worship. Even in Hungary and other East European Communist countries priests and religious teachers receive salaries from the state. Except in the case of chaplains in governmental institutions -- such as the army, governmental hospitals, and prisons -- this practice is unknown in the United States. There can be no doubt that any Federal or state law appropriating a sum of money for payment of the salaries of clergymen or religious teachers or for the general maintenance of religious schools would be held unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court. Actually, the constitution or laws of every one of the 48 states expressly prohibit the direct appropriation of tax-raised funds for religion or religious schools.

This situation came about as part of the development which led to the secularization of the American public educational system. The primary purpose of Roman Catholic opposition to sectarian Protestantism in the public schools was not the removal of that Protestantism, but the removal of Catholic children. Their goal was the erection of a parallel Catholic parochial school system for all Catholic children. This could be affected only if schools in which Catholicism was taught would share in governmental funds with schools in which Protestantism was taught. The Catholic Church therefore demanded not that Protestantism be eliminated from the public schools, but that Catholic schools too receive public funds and thus become part of the general public school system.

To this the Protestants and secularists refused to agree. The alliance of secularism and Catholicism was sufficiently strong to require modification of the existing system towards the middle of the nineteenth century. But the secularists then shifted to form an alliance with Protestantism so that the modification should not be in the form so ardently desired by the Catholic Church. Instead, Protestantism accepted the secularization of the public school system in return for the adoption in the states of constitutional provisions and laws prohibiting appropriation of public funds for religious schools.

As a result of these laws and of the decision of the United States Supreme Court quoted above, we have not had in this country the situation that prevails in Quebec, where there are no secular schools but only Protestant and Catholic schools with Jewish children attending the Protestant schools. Nor have we had the experience of the Netherlands where the opening of the public schools led to the situation prevailing today in which there are more confessional schools than public schools. Nor have we had the experience of Belgium where governments stand and fall on the acrimoniously contested issue of whether they have been niggardly or over-generous in the amounts appropriated to confessional schools.

In recent years, however, we have begun to encounter this acrimony and bitterness, and this bringing of religion into the public arena. The Catholic Church has never conceded the justice of the compromise under which neither public schools nor public funds could be used for religious education. It is at present engaged in a tremendous school building expansion programme, and it is highly doubtful that its goal of enrolling all Catholic children in Catholic schools can be achieved without public funds. It is accordingly exerting increasing pressure for the adoption of laws, both Federal and state, under which public funds would be appropriated to finance those aspects of parochial school education that do not appear to be specifically religious -- e.g. the transport of the children to the schools, or the purchase of secular text-books and school equipment and supplies.

The Jewish community, too, is rapidly expanding its religious school system, in respect to both after-hour schools (a system which in the United States seems to be unique to the Jewish community) and all day schools or yeshivoth. The Jewish community, however, appears willing to carry by itself the financial burden of its religious school system. There is no significant voice within the Jewish community calling for the use of governmental funds to finance Jewish education or Jewish schools. Indeed, all Jewish organizations in the United States -- secular or religious -- that have spoken on the issue have unanimously and unqualifiedly expressed their opposition to the appropriation of tax-raised funds for religion or religious education.

STATE CONTROL OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

An act of Congress or of a state legislature appropriating public funds for religious schools would be an unconstitutional law respecting an establishment of religion. An act of Congress or of a state legislature prohibiting or unreasonably restricting religious schools would be equally unconstitutional as a law prohibiting the free exercise of religion. The same Constitution that forbids the government to aid religion forbids it to hamper it. The Constitution requires neutrality on the part of the government with respect to religion.

This was made clear in an historic decision of the United States Supreme Court handed down in 1925. During and shortly after the First World War, our country experienced a wave of extreme nationalism and xenophobia. It was during this period that Congress enacted the restrictive immigration law which effectively halted the flow of immigration to this country. And it was during this period that a number of states sought by law to abolish the various foreign language and private parochial schools and to require all children to receive their education exclusively in state schools. Such a law was enacted in Oregon.

The Supreme Court handed down a decision that may properly be called the Magna Carta of the parochial school system, just as the 1948 decision outlawing religious instruction in the public schools may properly be called the Magna Carta of the secular school system. Parents, said the Court, cannot be compelled to send their children only to state schools, particularly where (as in the case of Catholic parents) their religious convictions prohibit the children from receiving their secular education independently of religious education. States may provide public schools where children can receive a secular education free of cost -- if their parents so desire it; but the children cannot be forced to receive that education in public schools, and the parents cannot be compelled to send them to the public schools.

But, while the state cannot compel children to receive a secular education exclusively in state schools, it can require them to receive a secular education either under public or private auspices. This was decided by the Supreme Court a few years ago. A small but extremely religious chasidic group established a yeshivah in Brooklyn in a section reminiscent of the Polish ghetto. In this yeshivah the children learned only Torah and Talmudic subjects. No secular subjects were taught; and indeed, no English was spoken, the languages of instruction being exclusively Yiddish and Hebrew. The children attended no other schools, but studied at the yeshivah daily from morning to evening.

The parents of the children were prosecuted for violating the law requiring all children to receive a minimum secular education. They claimed that the law was unconstitutional in that it violated their religious freedom because under their interpretation of the Jewish religion it was forbidden to study secular subjects. All the courts that considered the case -- from the lowest children's court to the United States Supreme Court -- overruled their contention. They all held that the religious freedom of the parents must yield to the paramount needs of the general community, which include a citizenry that has received at least a minimum secular education.

The effect of this decision is to empower government officials to supervise the operation of Catholic parochial and Jewish day schools, where both secular and religious education are given to the extent necessary to insure that the children receive the required secular education. Since education in the United States is primarily a matter of state rather than national concern, the amount of such government supervision varies from state to state. In no state, however, has this been a matter of serious concern to the Jewish community. With the exception of such rare and atypical instances as the Brooklyn yeshivah referred to above, the standards of instruction in Jewish day schools compare favourably with those prevailing in public schools, and the state's power of supervision has not to any noticeable extent interfered with the operation of Jewish day schools.

ZONING RESTRICTIONS ON RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS

The power of a state to regulate and supervise education in religious schools is limited to the secular education given there. But the overwhelming majority of Jewish religious schools in the United States do not give any secular education. The children attending them receive their secular education in public schools and attend the Jewish schools after public school hours and on Sunday. The religious education given in these schools is completely exempt from state supervision or control.

But the buildings in which this education is given are not exempt from state supervision and control. The state has the power -- and indeed the duty -- to require that the buildings shall be safe for the children attending them; that the buildings shall be fireproof, shall have a sufficient number of exits, shall be well-constructed, shall be free of rodents and vermin and otherwise sanitary, etc.

However, here too state regulation and control has been no problem to the Jewish community. The physical aspect of Jewish schools are almost universally far above the minimum standards required by law. The Jewish community has been more than willing to expend the funds required to protect the safety and health of their children in religious schools.

The Jewish community has also been quite willing to comply with the aesthetic views of the community in which its religious schools are established. It has been willing to erect religious school buildings and synagogues that conform to the general architectural pattern of the community, and to make sure that there is adequate room to park cars and thus avoid congesting the surrouding streets.

In most places this willingness of the Jewish community to comply with local building standards has proved sufficient and the Jewish community has experienced no difficulty in erecting new synagogues and religious school buildings. In some towns and villages, however, this has not been the case. Zoning ordinances have been adopted with the view of excluding houses of worship and religious schools entirely from the community, or relegating them to the industrial and less desirable sections of the town. The present trend of Jews away from the cities into neighbouring suburbs -- thus requiring the erection of new synagogues and religious schools -- has made this an increasingly serious problem.

It must be noted that rarely are these exclusionary ordinances motivated by anti-Semitism. Rarely are they discriminatory against Jews; almost invariably they apply equally to new Christian churches and religious schools. They are enacted simply because the local residents wish to preserve the exclusively residential character of the district or town and object to additional communal buildings.

The constitutionality of these exclusionary zoning ordinances has never been the subject of a definitive decision by the United States Supreme Court. It has been considered by many state courts. Most of these have held such laws to be unconstitutional infringements on religious freedom and have declared them void. A minority of state courts has upheld them. Ultimately, the final word will be given by the Supreme Court.

SUNDAY LAWS AND SABBATH OBSERVERS

Exclusionary zoning ordinances operate most seriously against Orthodox Jews. Reform and most Conservative Jews use automobiles on the Sabbath, and therefore an ordinance which puts a considerable distance between their homes and their synagogues is mainly an inconvenience. To the Orthodox Jew who must walk to his synagogue on the Sabbath and holy days such an ordinance is a serious restriction upon his freedom of religion.

Sunday laws, too, operate principally against Orthodox Jews. With the exception of a few states on the West Coast, all American states have laws prohibiting or restricting business and trade on Sunday, the Christian Sabbath. In a number, persons observing a day other than Sunday as their religious day of rest -- primarily Jews, but also Seventh Day Adventists -- are exempt from these laws, and may conduct their business on Sundays, provided they refrain from engaging in business on Saturdays. Most states, however, do not have such exemptions or have severely limited exemptions. In these states, Orthodox Jews suffer a serious economic handicap. Their religion requires them to keep their shops closed on Saturdays; the state law requires them to keep them closed also on Sundays.

A few years ago the constitutionality of these Sunday laws was attacked by two Orthodox Jews who operated small kosher butcher shops in the predominantly Jewish section of New York City. They claimed that the laws violated their religious freedom by imposing an economic hardship upon their conforming to their religious conscience. The New York courts refused to accept their contention and the United States Supreme Court refused to upset the state courts' decision.

After this decision was announced, the Jewish community of New York -- more than half of the Jews in the United States live in New York State -- launched a concerted drive to have the state's Sunday law amended so as to exempt persons observing a day other than Sunday as their religious day of rest. Unfortunately, this campaign has so far proved unsuccessful. The reason has been the unyielding opposition of the Catholic Church. The Protestant Church groups have recognized the justice of the Jews' complaint and have endorsed the proposed amendment. But the Catholic Church has been uncompromising in its opposition, and it exerts considerable political power in New York, with the result that it has succeeded in defeating all attempts to provide relief to Sabbath-observing Orthodox Jews.

HUMANE SLAUGHTERING LEGISLATION

Another law which the Orthodox deem a threat to their religious freedom was recently enacted by Congress. European Jewish communities have had long experience with laws requiring the humane slaughter of animals for food.

The first such law in the United States was enacted by Congress a few months ago.

When the measure was first introduced a few years ago, most of the Jewish community, Orthodox as well as Conservative and Reform, and Jewish secular organizations, felt that the measure should not be opposed. Their view was that all that rightfully could be asked was that the measure contain adequate protection for shechitah, the Jewish ritual method of slaughtering animals. The sponsors of the measure were quite willing to write into it all necessary provisions to protect shechitah. One small element of Orthodox Judaism, however, urged opposition to the measure entirety. It argued on the basis of European experience that if the measure were adopted it would be an opening wedge and that in time efforts would be made to eliminate the exemption. This wing of Orthodoxy -- consisting of the older Yiddish-speaking, European-trained rabbinate -- succeeded in converting the other Orthodox groups to its position. The result was a split in the Jewish community; the Orthodox urged opposition to all humane slaughtering legislation; the Conservative and Reform argued for the safeguarding of shechitah by an adequately drafted exemption in the measure.

Despite the strenuous opposition of the Orthodox community, the measure was enacted by Congress and approved by the President. The measure as enacted identifies shechitah as humane and contains an exemption which even the Orthodox agree adequately protects shechitah. There remains, however, their fear that in time the forces behind the humane slaughtering amendment will initiate a campaign to repeal the exemption and thus outlaw shechitah in the United States.

CONCLUSION

These, then, have been the experiences of the Jewish community in six specific areas of the relationship of religion and government in the United States. There are many other arenas of conflict, competition, misunderstanding and of co-operation. Some impinge directly on the nerve of Jewish sensibility; others seem peripheral only because they affect the status of the Jew as an American citizen vitally concerned with the doctrine of separation and all that it implies.

It would be untrue to contend that the Jewish community has a unanimous view on all issues. There are disagreements as to policy and more frequently there are disagreements as to strategy. Some Jewish organizations emphasize principle, others emphasize public relations. Each issue in and of itself reveals variations in the tactics and position of the organized spokesmen for the Jewish community. There is extensive machinery for co-ordination and for the exchange of views in an effort to arrive at common positions. There is co-operation between the secular organizations, the synagogues, and the rabbinic groups. The co-operation could be more intensive and more effective, but it is not altogether absent.

How have the activities of the Jewish community affected its relationship with the Christian community? The principle of separation of church and state is essentially the Protestant contribution to American political thinking. It is too early to tell whether the changing demographic picture of America and the profound influence of religious conformism will alter the alliance of forces for or against the maintenance of this principle. The relationship between the Jewish community and the Protestant community is by and large a healthy one, and even where differences occur these are the subject of civil debate. Where differences occur with the Catholic community, they do not find only the Jew and the Catholic in contention. The overwhelming portion of Protestant community finds itself in intellectual agreement with the Jewish position. Here and there Protestantism and its myriad sects are ambivalent, but the central position of the Protestant Church finds itself allied with the Jewish position. While 'the competition of creeds' may yet produce hostility and acrimony, it is fair to say that it is a subject debated in the market place of free ideas.

How does the Jewish community view the experiment of separation of church and state and religious freedom that has evolved in the United States? There can hardly be any doubt as to the answer. Despite the comparatively minor hardships and inconveniences indicated above, the American experiment has proved to be a tremendous benefit to the American Jewish community. Perhaps more than any other group in the United States -- certainly more than any other religious group -- American Judaism is committed to the principle of separation of church and state and religious freedom as written into our Constitution and declared by our Supreme Court.

Dear Mr. Robison:

The prospect of attending the NAIRO conference in San Juan is a tempting one, and your kind invitation to take part in the program makes it more so. Regretfully, however, I must decline. Not only is our travel budget sorely strained, by we have several important meetings scheduled for October that would make it virtually impossible for me to be away.

Please accept my thanks for the invitation and my very best wishes for the success of the conference.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

The NAIRO Department of National Private Services is setting up the two sessions it will conduct at the 1959 NAIRO Conference in San Juan. The first, from 4:30 to 6:00 P.M., Tuesday, October 13, will be a discussion of the major presentation on "The Decade Ahead" at the General Session at lunch that day. We have decided to break this up into three topics, Federal Legislation, State Anti-Discrimination Laws and Southern Laws to Prevent Desegregation. On each of these three topics we will have a speaker and a discussant. Between them they will cover significant developments during the last year, a prognosis of the problems immediately ahead and program suggestions for the national private agencies.

We are particularly anxious to have you serve as the discussant of the third point. This involves no preparation on your part except making the appropriate plane and hotel reservations. Let me know as soon as you can whether we can count on you.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Paul:

I'm taking you up on your offer to make a reservation for me at the Piedmont Hotel. If you can get me a nice room for about no more than eight bucks I will appreciate it. Naturally, I expect radio, TV and hot and cold running chambermaids.

I also would like to have an appointment with Ralph McGill when I'm in Atlanta. If you could be helpful in that respect I would appreciate it. I'm enclosing a copy of the letter which I'm sending him today so that you might use your substantial influence in my behalf.

I look forward to seeing you and thanks for everything.

Dear Mr. McGill:

I would very much appreciate the opportunity of seeing you and talking with you on my next trip to Atlanta, if it meets with your convenience. I will arrive in Atlanta about mid-day September 14th and depart early evening September 16th. Any time in that period when you have the time, I would be most grateful for the chance to meet with you.

For purposes of identification, let me tell you that as regional director for the American Jewish Congress I service the states of Alabama, Georgia and Florida. Local AJC Proposal Wins State-Wide Approval

May Go Before White House Conference

Bring in Two New Members

WHEEL OF FORTUNE SPINS TRIP TO NASSAU

The Membership Committee, under the able and energetic chairmanship of Mrs. Peritz (Dollye) Scheinberg, has set its sights on at least 100 additional members before the November Annual Meeting.

As an incentive for all of us, Dollye has announced that all who bring in at least two new members prior to the 15th of November will be given a chance on the Wheel of Fortune that will spin out a FREE TRIP FOR TWO to Nassau, including transportation, food and hotel accomodations.

To be eligible, all you have to do is call the AJC Chapter Office, FR 3-4749, ask for application cards and return them to the office, filled out of course, before the 15th of next month. Dollye and her two cohorts in this project, Mrs. Al (Lilly) Stone and Mrs. Samuel G. (Sadie) Kling will see that a chance on the Wheel of Fortune is given to you before the wheel is spun at the Annual Meeting.

Get busy now and line up your new members. Remember, you may be the lucky one to take that fabulous trip to Nassau.

AJC Youth Committee Reports

OUR PLAN GIVEN STATE-WIDE HEARING

(The Youth Committee, led by James R. Katzman, is making a major contribution to the successful State-wide planning which will precede next year's White House Conference on Children and Youth. To bring you up to date, Jim Katzman prepared the following resume. Ed.)

Our AJC Chapter's Youth Committee sent delegates to two sessions at Tallahassee, on August 17th and October 1st. In doing so, we have become one of 100 cooperating agencies and organizations preparing for Florida's participation in the up-coming White House Conference.

Before going further, I particularly want to pay special tribute to Jerome C. Hofmayer, Babette Ackerman and Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Klein, whose work on a sub-committee, which ultimately proposed recommendations that the Chapter leadership adopted and implemented, may long be remembered.

In essence, we proposed to the State gathering that the President of the United States proclaim a National "Bill of Rights Year". If accepted, this would provide the basis for a nationwide rededication and reexamination of our present strengths and deficiencies as related to the ideal concepts of a free society.

At the August meeting, there was a disinclination to discuss the subject of intergroup relations. In fact, its absence was more conspicuous by the void rather than the breach. The two-day October session provided something different. Fortunately, the format of the White House Conference has been handed down, including the topic "Inter-Group Experience."

I requested and received an assignment to the sub-committee that would study Florida's proposals in this area. (Jim was later named chairman of the group). The subcommittee expressed itself on the many aspects of inter-racial and inter-religious relations in the South, with special emphasis on Florida.

A single recommendation came out of the conference, the one originally proposed by our Chapter's Youth Committee. Happily, I can report to you that this proposal was accepted and approved unanimously and with much enthusiasm. It highlighted the entire conference.

Now, our recommendation moves on to the national stage. You may be certain that this Chapter's representation will put forth every effort to the end that this fundamental concept of liberty and justice will represent part of Florida's resolve and contribution to the 1960 White House Conference of Children and Youth.

It is our firm conviction that through the President's proclaiming a National Bill of Rights Year, the nation will best be able to achieve

An Editorial

A TIME FOR ACTION

As Henrik Ibsen once wrote: "A community is like a ship; every one ought to be prepared to take the helm." We agree. Further, we say that this is a time for action by all of those who have shown interest in the AJCommittee.

As you read these few words, many of your fellow AJCites are deeply immersed in rewarding activities, rewarding for them as individuals and rewarding for the community they serve. These members, and you read about them regularly, as they throw themselves into project after project, have been prepared to take the helm. But, what about you?

Have you done more than simply sending in your membership dues to AJC this year? Have you thought about increasing your dues contribution, in the face of the additional load that AJC has taken on, both locally and nationally?

Have you responded to our pleas by bringing your many friends into the AJC fold? Have you volunteered to serve on committees, so that others may take advantage of your point of view? Have you thought about your obligations and responsibilities to the community, which has been so good to you, and, after seeing the crying need for fresh leadership, have you stepped forward, not as a critic, but as a worker with an objective plan at hand?

If you have, then this editorial is not for you—you're doing your share and we all owe you our deepest thanks. However, if you, like so many of us, haven't pitched in to do all that is possible to help AJC reach its many and varied goals, we urge that you begin to do so now.

You'll never regret it, that's for sure!

University of Miami Announces

INSTITUTE ON MIDDLE EAST AFFAIRS

Dr. Peritz Scheinberg, chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee has asked that we bring to your attention the University of Miami's Institute on Middle East Affairs, which will be conducted in the UM's Beaumont Lecture Hall the evenings of November 9, 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 23 and 24.

Dr. Charles Issawi of Columbia University will discuss Middle East economics; Dr. Marver H. Bernstein of Princeton will speak on Israel and the Middle East; Dr. Nasrollah S. Fatemi of Fairleigh Dickinson University will lecture on Middle Eastern cultures and religions; Dr. Paul L. Hanna of the University of Florida will speak of governments of the Middle East; and Dr. William B. Munson, director of the Institute from the University of Miami will conclude with lectures dealing with the strategic role of the Middle East during the current East-West tug of Cold War.

The AJCommittee, naturally, is vitally interested in the success of this Institute, as it is in all situations where the community's interests and knowledge is broadened. With that in mind, we urge our members to attend the Institute.

Complete registration information is available at the Evening Division Office at the University of Miami, MO 1-2511.

From "Let's Be Human"

A SINGLE WORD

"Tell us in a single word what is the most important thing in American civilization." This was the task posed for educator Max Lerner by a Polish journalist in Warsaw last year. A dozen responses ran through Lerner's head. Liberty - Equality - Democracy - Tolerance - but none of them seemed exactly right. Finally, thinking furiously, Lerner heard himself say, "Acess."

"We have heard of American "success," said the Polish writer, "but never of American access. What is that?"

"Our Declaration of Independence," replied Lerner, "says that men are born free and equal. Actually, we know they are born very unequal, for they may have unequal potential. But, we believe all youngsters should have equal access to opportunities to develop the potentials they have. In this sense, access is the key to our society."

Chapter Notes From Here and There

East-West Relations Covered

In addition to the discussion groups fully covered elsewhere, we want to congratulate Elaine and Alfred Boaz for the stimulating meeting they hosted, which brought William Gaither, prominent Miami attorney who went behind the Iron Curtain with Ralph Renick and others recently, and a group of AJC members together to discuss the implications of Mr. Khrushchev's visit to the United States.

Mark November 22 Down Now

Here's another reminder that the Chapter's Annual Dinner is slated for Sunday, November 22nd. We'll have all the details in next month's issue. For now, all we ask is that you circle the date on your calendar and make plans to attend the affair with all your friends.

How About Leading A Discussion Group?

One of the backbones of any successful organization is the full participation of all its members. For AJC, the many discussion groups that are pinpointed by geographical distribution around South Florida serve a great purpose. There are still some areas that are yet uncovered. Also, there are some groups that are growing too big and should be divided to give everyone an equal chance to contribute. We're looking for additional group coordinators. Can we count on you? If so, please either call the office or Groups chairman Roddy Rood, HI 3-1470.

Thank You For Your Greetings

In response to your many kindnesses, the Officers, Board Members and Staff all join in extending their best wishes for a Happy New Year to you and your loved ones.

Jewish Attitudes Survey

TRAINING SESSION FOR INTERVIEWERS

Charles Finkelstein, chairman of the Jewish Attitudes Survey has announced that plans have been completed for a training session for all interviewers.

The survey will endeavor to learn more about what Jews in Greater Miami think about themselves as Jews, Judaism itself, matters of Jewish interest and organization, their relationships to non-Jewish neighbors, anti-Semitism and similar subjects. This information will be obtained through a series of interviews with a selected sample of Dade County Jews.

For those interested in becoming a part of this exciting team effort, either call the office or co-chairman Frances Lehman, UN 6-0592.

Two Discussion Groups Under Way

Stuart Simon On Religious Practices In Schools

Dr. and Mrs. Jerome A. Kramer played host for the fall's initial meeting of the South West Miami discussion group.

Choosing the topic "Should We Sanction Religious Practices in the Public Schools?" Stuart Simon was asked to lead the lively and interesting exchange of ideas.

Stuart, whom you will recall wrote of the Chamberlain Case in the last issue of the Satellite, brought the group up to date. The chairman of our Civil Rights Committee explained the grounds upon which the suit had been filed in the Circuit Court.

Group reactions varied—from the complete elimination of all religious practices in the public schools to the continuation of all such practices. Some felt that since we do live in a predominately Christian society, this exposure is not harmful but simply makes our childhren aware of differences which exist.

Others strongly felt that this exposure to difference was harmful, partiuclarly during the Christmas and Easter seasons. A favorable solution hit upon by many would be the elimination of specific approaches in favor of an emphasis on the more general aspects of the religions that have a common end. This may be ideal, but the group recognized that it did not seem to be a realistic approach.

The South West Miami discussion group will next meet on October 28th. If you live in this section, call the Office for details.

Dr. Alan A. Lipton On Securing Children From Prejudice

With forty AJC members on hand at the home of Natalie and Mel Frumkes, Dr. Alan A. Lipton, professor of psychiatry at the University of Miami said that the roots of prejudice in children militates against a good adjustment to life. He said that frequently the prejudiced child is hurt more and suffers longer than the target of the prejudice.

A member of the discussion group amazed the others when she related an example of prejudice in her two and a half year old child. No punches were pulled as the group explored its own prejudices, bigotries that would cloud their coping with meeting prejudicial problems which their children would face.

Mel Frumkes reports that a great deal of enthusiasm in this particular subject was generated. Before moving on to another topic, the group will next discuss the ways in which we should handle a prejudicial situation when our children meet it and, further, the best method of fortifying our children against such an eventuality.

Those members living in the South Biscayne Bay area, wishing to attend the October 21st session, should call the AJC Office at once.

National News Notes

MILESTONES

On August 24, AJC moved its National headquarters to its beautiful new home, the Institute of Human Relations, 165 East 56th St., New York 22, N Y. The $2,500,000 eight-story glass and marble structure is, in Dr. John Slawson's words, "a physical symbol of society's mounting concern with human relations." Dedicated to man's understanding of his fellow man, the Institute will be a unique center for research and education and for diversified programs in the field of intergroup relations dealing with the sources of racial and religious conflict. Its facilities will be used by scholars, religious and communal leaders, educators and opinion molders throughout this country and abroad. In addition to serving the Committee's permanent headquarters, the Institute of Human Relations will house the New York Chapter of the AJC, Community Relations Service, National Labor Service, American Jewish Year Book, Commentary Magazine, all part of the catalogue of AJC services.

A footnote on progress: in 1906, AJC's first office was located in the Hebrew Charities Bldg. at 356 Second Avenue. Its paid staff consisted of one secretary who was later joined by a single clerical aide. Currently more than 26,000 men and women in 44 chapters in 600 American communities are AJC members and the Committee maintains offices in Paris and Buenos Aires, correspondents in a number of European countries, North Africa, Israel.

AJC Praised

School Calendars Again Distributed

As an annual gesture of community understanding, the local AJC Chapter again made available its famous School Calendar to all public school principals and social agencies' administrators.

Two hundred and fifty copies of the calendar, which is prepared by the Community Relations Service of AJC nationally, were given to school head Dr. Joe Hall, who, in turn, distributed them throughout the system. An additional 350 copies were sent to agency leaders, who look upon the calendars as a primary resource in the planning of overall programming for the year.

Basically, the calendar designates and explains all religious holidays, national holidays and special events; e.g., "Bill of Rights Day," "Brotherhood Week," etc.

In return, our Chapter has been widely praised for distributing what Dr. H. Franklin Williams, Vice-President of the University of Miami, describes as "the best brief calendar for the guidance of school and university people in the matter of religious holidays."

Here again is another example of the way AJC contributes to the general welfare of the entire community.

"PREJUDICE WON'T MAKE US SELL OUR HOUSE!"

By Ralph Bass

Reprinted from Coronet Magazine of July 1959, this is a popularly written account of a currently successful effort to prevent panic selling in a changing neighborhood.

Springfield Gardens is a middle-class residential community in the borough of Queens, N. Y. Ralph Bass, a resident of the community (and a staff member of the American Jewish Committee), tells what the people of Springfield Gardens did to resist the provocations of real estate operators, bolster the morale and overcome the prejudices of fellow residents. He includes suggestions that have been applied successfully in other communities faced with similar problems.

Inexpensive reprints of the article are available through the office.

Books Termed One Way To Expand Child's View

READING an exciting, well-written book about people and ways of life different from his own can be a delightful pastime for a child. Such reading can help to broaden a youngster's point of view and help him to understand other people better.

"But books are only a beginning," says Ann G. Wolfe. "If parents would expose their children to various types of people in real life, as well as in books, the youngsters' own lives would be enriched."

Mrs. Wolfe is the compiler of the 1959 list, "About 100 Books—A Gateway to Better Intergroup Understanding." The list is published by the American Jewish Committee.

Critical of Parents

Mrs. Wolfe, herself the mother of an 8½-year-old son, believes that too few parents today provide a realistic way for their children to develop knowledge about other people.

In their limited environment, most children are bound by the barriers of their parent's social group. Such groups, Mrs. Wolfe says, are quite homogenous—religiously, economically, racially and educationally. Thus, many children are totally unfamiliar with other ways of living because they lack first-hand acquaintance with people out of their own circle.

Books, although not the entire answer, can help extend the limits of such a child's understanding. However, Mrs. Wolfe stresses, they should be good books that are selected carefully. She takes exception to books that "type" people of minority groups. Too often in children's books, she says, domestics are shown as Negroes; the corner vegetable man, heavily moustached, is an Italian, and the laundry man is Chinese.

A Job for Editors

"I hope," she added, "that this practice will be dislodged. It is a job for editors, who must challenge authors more about the kinds of stories they write for children."

The task of reading and analyzing new books, and compiling the recently revised listing, was a challenging one for Mrs. Wolfe and the Division of Youth Services of the American Jewish Committee.

Included are stories about American Indians, Quakers, Jews and Mexicans. Because of the increasing importance of Asia and Africa in world affairs, children should find the new stories about these countries interesting.

Books on Japan, Mrs. Wolfe notes, offer young readers much color about an old, traditional culture mixed with a recently modernized one. Several recently published books describe life in the south today. However, there are only a few about Puerto Rico.

Each of the 100 books listed is described in a brief paragraph that also lists the author, publisher, price and the age group for which it is written. The list, in book form, costs 25 cents. It is available from the committee, 165 East Fifty-sixth Street.

We enclose a copy of the brief in the case of Camacho v. Doe, filed by the American Jewish Congress in the highest court of the state of New York opposing the requirement that voters must be able to read and write the English language. The case was brought by an American citizen born in Puerto Rico who is able to read and write Spanish but was not permitted to register because he is not literate in English. The AJCongress brief supports his contention that the provision in the New York State Constitution and the State Election Law requiring literacy in English violates the Federal Constitution. AJCongress stated that it filed this brief as a friend of the Court, in part because there are a number of Jewish citizens who are literate in Yiddish but not in English, and in part because, even if there were no such disfranchised Jewish citizens, it would be concerned with the fact that these provisions constitute an impairment of democratic principles.

The brief presents data showing that adoption of the literacy requirement in 1921 was clearly a product of chauvinism. Only 12 of the 50 states in the Union require literacy in English as a qualification for voting. Arguing that literacy in English is not necessary to comprehension of political issues, the brief shows that these issues are fully discussed in the Spanish press in New York as well as in the Yiddish press.

REMEDIES FOR RACIAL OR RELIGIOUS DISCRIMINATION BY HOSPITALS

Arbitrary refusal of hospital care for the sick or injured because of race, creed or color is a tragic form of group discrimination.

For this reason Chicago and Illinois have recently provided special protections to prevent such discrimination.

The purpose of this pamphlet is to tell you what can be done about it.

Laws alone will not guarantee each citizen full and equal enjoyment of hospital facilities. Officials charged with law enforcement, as well as aggrieved persons themselves, must be vigilant in protecting the rights of all who are in need of hospital care. In Illinois there are ample legal means to achieve this end.

DIRECT PROSECUTION

Two laws* permit prosecution by law enforcement officers on their own initiative or on complaint by a victim of hospital discrimination:

I. Chicago Hospital Anti-Discrimination Ordinance

This ordinance became law in Chicago in 1956. It reads:

> "No hospital, nor any person acting as superintendent or manager, or who is otherwise in charge or control of any hospital, nor any person connected with or rendering service in any hospital in any capacity whatsoever, nor any agent or employee thereof shall deny to any person admission for care or treatment, equality of care or treatment in a hospital, or the use of any of the hospital facilities and services relating to care or treatment of such person, on account of race, color, creed, national origin or ancestry, provided that a member of the medical staff of said hospital or an authorized physician designated to act for him may examine such person and determine the need of such person for medical care or treatment." (Chicago Municipal Code, (137-13.1)

Section 137-19 provides for a $100 to $200 fine for any violation.

Two forms of discrimination with respect to care or treatment are prohibited — discrimination in admission to a hospital; and discrimination in use of hospital facilities.

Enforcement of this ordinance is by quasi-criminal proceeding in the Municipal Court of Chicago, to be prosecuted by the Corporation Counsel of Chicago.

This ordinance was passed under the city's statutory power to regulate the conduct of hospitals (Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955) c. 24, Sections 21-20, 23-83). And "the right to regulate includes the right to compel persons engaged in businesses catering to the public to furnish equal facilities and accommodations to all members of the public without discrimination." Pickett v. Kuchen, 323 Ill. 138, 140 (1926).

* The Illinois Civil Rights Law (Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955) c. 38, Sections 125 ff.), providing for equal right to the service of places of public accommodations, does not include hospitals, clinics or dispensaries among the enumerated places of business to which the Law is applicable. As a result, it apears that the prohibitions of the law apply only to certain specified classes of business, not including hospitals. See Cecil v. Green, 161 Ill. 265 (1896); Grace v. Mosely, 122 Ill. App. 100 (1904).

2. Illinois Emergency Medical Treatment Law

A state law enacted in 1927 requires all private and public hospitals to render first aid or emergency treatment to all severely injured persons. It reads:

> "No hospital, either public or private where surgical operations are performed, operating in this State shall refuse to give emergency medical treatment or first aid to any applicant who applies for the same in case of accident or injury where the same shall be liable to cause death or severe injury." (Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955) c. 111½, Sec. 86).

Section 87 provides a fine of $50 to $200 for each violation.

PRIVATE CIVIL SUIT

Criminal prosecutions have not generally been effective in enforcing laws against discrimination. Proving facts is more difficult in criminal cases. Public officials have full power to decide whether or not to start a criminal case, and control its prosecution. Lastly small fines are usually no deterrent. Some businesses which consistently violate anti-discrimination laws treat such fines as an ordinary cost of doing business.

Even though the hospital anti-discrimination laws do not expressly provide for civil action against a discriminating hospital directly by the victim or his family, there is substantial legal authority for actions for damages or other relief. These authorities hold that an aggrieved person whose interest the legislative enactment was designed to protect has a civil cause of action against the violator of the law; 2 Restatement, Torts, Sec. 286; Fitzgerald v. Pan American World Airways, 229 F. 2d 499 (1956); Kardon v. National Gypsum Co. 69 F. Supp. 512 (1946); Sloan v. F. W. Woolworth Co. 193 Ill. App. 620, 625 (1915); O'Donnell v. Barach, 1 Ill. App. 2nd 157 (1953); Private Remedies Under State Equal Rights Statutes, 44 Ill. Law Review 363 at 373 (1949); Bolden v. Grand Rapids Operating Co. 239 Mich. 318, 214 N. W. 241 (1927); 6 McQuillin, The Law of Municipal Corporations, Sec. 22.06, Page 292 (3rd ed., 1949).

LOSS OF TAX EXEMPTION

The remedies outlined so far are conventional, and experience has shown, often inadequate to end discriminatory practices.

In 1955 the Illinois legislature supplied a tool for making conventional remedies effective. Recognizing the public purpose which grants to hospitals an exemption from taxation, it amended the tax laws as follows:

"No hospital, however, which has been adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction to have denied admission to any person because of race, color or creed, shall be exempt from taxation," (Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955), c. 120 Sec. 500 (7).

Before a hospital's tax exemption can be challenged under this law, there must first be a court judgment that the hospital has discriminated because of race, creed or color, and such discrimination must have been in denying admission to the hospital.

To date there is no definition of what kind of a court judgment is required. Any of the following would appear to be such a court judgment:

1. A finding of such discrimination in an action for Declaratory Judgment. (See Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955), c. 110, Sec. 57.1). However, the person discriminated against is not necessarily the proper party to bring such an action. This plaintiff must be a person affected by the hospital's tax exemption—i.e., a taxpayer. This is true at least in Cook County, where only a taxpayer can complain to the Board of Appeals of the tax exempt status of a hospital. People v. Nixon, 353 Ill. 556 (1933); Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955), c. 120, Section 598). In areas outside of Cook County, anyone interested in the amount of taxes raised (including a municipality) may file a complaint before the Board of Review. (Ill. Rev. Stat. (1955), c. 120 Sec. 589 (4); People v. Marshall Field & Co., 355 Ill. 633, 636 (1934). It would seem, therefore, that the suit for Declaratory Judgment should also be filed by a taxpayer or one interested in the taxes collected.

2. A conviction for denial of admission under the Chicago Hospital Anti-Discrimination Ordinance.

3. A conviction under the Illinois Emergency Medical Treatment Law for denial of admission because of race, creed or color.

4. A judgment for the plaintiff in a civil action against a hospital based upon a finding of denial of admission because of race, creed or color.

Armed with such a judgment, any taxpayer could file a complaint before the local Board of Review or Board of Appeals which grants or refuses tax exemptions. See People v. J. B. Inderrieden Co., 375 Ill. 458, 461 (1941); People ex rel McDonough v. Illinois Central Railroad Co., 355 Ill. 605, 608 (1934). If the Board fails to refuse tax exemption pursuant to a properly-presented complaint, a mandamus suit should be filed for the purpose of compelling the Board to place the property on the tax rolls.

COURT OF APPEALS

State of New York

In the Matter of the Application of

Jose Camacho,

Petitioner, against

John Doe, Richard Roe, John Styles, and John Brown, whose true names are unknown, said names being fictitious, the persons intended being the Inspectors of Election in and for the 26th Election District of the 6th Assembly District of the County of Bronx, and constituting the Board of Inspectors of Election of said Election District, Respondents.

BRIEF FOR AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS
AMICUS CURIAE

Preliminary Statement

This is a proceeding challenging the validity under the United States Constitution of the provision in the New York Constitution and the Election Law requiring literacy in the English language as a qualification to vote in any election, Federal, State or municipal, held in the State of New York. The petitioner is a native American citizen, born in Puerto Rico, who is completely literate in the Spanish language but is unable to read and write in English.

The petitioner applied to a Special Term of the Supreme Court in Bronx County, the place of his residence, for an order addressed to the Board of Elections of his Election District directing them to allow him to take a literacy test in Spanish (or, presumably, otherwise to establish to their satisfaction his literacy in that language) and then to permit him to register and vote on Election Day. Special Term, adjudging the provision in the New York Constitution and Election Law not to be in conflict with any provision of the Federal Constitution, dismissed the proceeding, and the petitioner appealed directly to this Court pursuant to subdivision 4 of Section 588 of the Civil Practice Act.

Interest of the Amicus

The American Jewish Congress has a twofold interest in this litigation. The organization was formed in part "to help secure and maintain the equality of opportunity, * * * to safeguard the civil, political, economic and religious rights of Jews everywhere" and "to help preserve and extend the democratic way of life." There are a number of citizens of the Jewish faith who are completely literate in the Yiddish language but are unable to read or write the English language. Literacy in English was not an absolute requirement for naturalization until 1950. The decision in this case affects such persons, and the American Jewish Congress deems the denial of the franchise to such persons a deprivation of their civil and political rights.

In a larger sense, however, even if there were no citizens of the Jewish faith disenfranchised by the decision of the court below, we would still have an interest in this case. We are concerned with the preservation of American democratic principles. This to us involves two corollary implications: First, that no adult citizen who is able to understand and act intelligently in respect to the political issues of the day should be denied the right and duty of participating in the election of the government of the state and nation. Secondly, we believe that any effort through compulsion to elevate a particular language or culture over other languages or cultures, or to make it the exclusively recognized official language or culture of all the people, is inconsistent with the concept of cultural pluralism to which we believe modern American democracy is committed. The recent incorporation of Alaska and Hawaii as equal states in our Union gives evidence of this, for both states have large non-English speaking populations with cultures far removed from the Anglo-American cultural tradition which the assailed provision of the New York Constitution and statute presupposes.

For these reasons we have sought and received leave to submit this brief amicus curiae.

The Statutory Provisions Involved in This Proceeding

The last paragraph of Article II, Section 1 of the New York Constitution provides as follows:

"Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions, after January first, one thousand nine hundred twenty-two, no person shall become entitled to vote by attaining majority, by naturalization or otherwise, unless such person is also able, except for physical disability, to read and write English."

Section 150 of the Election Law provides in part: "* * * In the case of a person who became entitled to vote in this state by attaining majority, by naturalization or otherwise after January first, nineteen hundred twenty-two, such person must, in addition to the foregoing provisions, be able, except for physical disability, to read and write English. * * *"

ARGUMENT

The Issue to Which This Brief is Addressed

This brief amicus curiae is addressed to the validity under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution of the above quoted provisions of the New York Constitution and Election Law. The Fourteenth Amendment provides in part that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It is not necessary to determine which of these provisions is invoked here to challenge the literacy-in-English qualification. The basic test of validity is the same under any of them, and all are probably applicable. The right to vote at least for Federal officials is undoubtedly a privilege or immunity of citizens. Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U.S. 651; Wiley V. Sinkler, 179 U.S. 58. It is reasonable to suggest that the right, at least on the part of a citizen, to participate in selecting the representatives that govern him is a liberty of which he may not be deprived without due process of law. Cf. Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510. A disenfranchisement of voters on grounds of language certainly is a denial to them of the equal protection of the laws unless the disqualification is constitutionally justifiable. Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347; Lane v. Wilson, 307 U.S. 268.

The issue, therefore, is whether a requirement that voters be literate in the English language is constitutionally justifiable. We do not here discuss the constitutional aspects of a voting requirement of literacy in a commonly used modern language; it is not necessary in this case to reach that issue. We contend only that a provision restricting qualifying literacy to the English language is not justifiable under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

The Test to be Applied

According to the report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights (1959), pages 67-68, there are approximately some 618,000 American citizens of Puerto Rican ancestry living in New York City. About 170,000 of them have lived here long enough to satisfy the state's residence requirements for voting. However, 59% of Puerto Rican residents of New York read and write only Spanish and are therefore not permitted to vote. Although the exact number so disenfranchised is not indicated in the Commission's report, the report does state that "This Commission has found that Puerto Rican-American citizens are being denied the right to vote, and that these denials exist in substantial numbers in the State of New York."

We submit that only the most cogent grounds can justify the denial of the franchise to so substantial a part of American citizens who are residents of New York. It is quite reasonable that a court in reviewing the constitutionality of an act of the legislature should give great weight to the judgment of the legislature in its determination of the necessity of the legislation. Ordinarily, if a situation exists which the legislature deems to require legislative action, the courts will not interfere with its determination of the appropriateness of a proposed remedy unless the legislature's act was patently unreasonable, United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 134. Where, however, the legislation abridges a fundamental right of American citizens, a far sterner test is imposed. "The rational connection between the remedy provided and the evil to be curbed, which in other context might support legislation against attack on due process grounds, will not suffice." Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516, 530. As was said in Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88, 95-96: "Mere legislative preference for one rather than another means for combatting substantive evils, therefore, may well prove an inadequate foundation on which to rest regulations which are aimed at or in their operation diminish the effective exercise of rights so necessary to the maintenance of democratic institutions."

Where the legislation restricts the right to vote the most stern judicial test is to be applied when its constitutionality is challenged. In United States v. Carolene Products, supra, the Supreme Court did not find it necessary"* * * to consider now whether legislation which restricts those political processes which can ordinarily be expected to bring about repeal of undesirable legislation, is to be subjected to more exacting judicial scrutiny under the general prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment than are most other types of legislation. * * *" In subsequent cases, however, the court did find it necessary to pass upon the question and answered it in the affirmative. Thomas v. Collins, supra, Thornhill v. Alabama, supra.

The reason for the imposition of a sterner test in cases involving fundamental liberties, particularly those affecting the franchise, is obvious. One may well urge that in general, removal of unwise laws should be sought by appeal not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government. But this necessarily implies that recourse to the ballot is unobstructed and that the processes of democratic government are kept free to operate. It follows that the court should subject to a closer than ordinary scrutiny and impose more exacting standards in respect to legislative actions that obstruct the channels for legislative change. It little profits the Spanish-speaking Puerto Ricans or Yiddish-speaking Jews that the literacy test assailed here can be removed by action of the legislature if those against whom the test discriminates are barred from participating in the process of selecting the members of the legislature. In such a case the court must assume something of the nature of a fiduciary for the protection of the otherwise unprotected disenfranchised and must demand a strict accounting on the part of the legislature.

This is particularly so where the disenfranchised is a racial, religious or national minority. United States v. Carolene Products, supra, Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390; Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U.S. 284. In the latter case, the court answered in the affirmative the question left open in the Carolene Products case: "* * * whether prejudice against discrete and insular minorities may be a special condition, which tends seriously to curtail the operation of those political processes ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities, and which may call for a correspondingly more searching judicial inquiry. * * *" See also Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 461.

This Court therefore must determine what legitimate end the assailed literacy test sought to achieve, and whether the use of the literacy test is a valid means to achieve that end. In this respect, we submit that the only legitimate end that could be sought to be achieved was to assure that citizens exercising their elective franchise have a reasonably intelligent understanding of the issues and the candidates upon whom they are called to pass judgment, so that they can make "intelligent use of the ballot." Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 79 S.Ct. 985, 990.

It is, we submit, beyond the constitutional power of the legislature to employ the grant or withholding of the elector's franchise as a means to induce persons to learn the English language. We do not challenge the power of the state to encourage and facilitate the learning of the English language by residents of the state. For that purpose the state and municipalities can and do provide free instruction in the English language for foreigners and engage in public campaigns to induce residents to learn English. However, to deny persons their constitutional right of engaging in the election of their government as a means to influence them to learn English, is, we submit, a form of impermissible coercion.

In Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, the Supreme Court held that a state could not declare it a crime for persons to teach children a foreign language; and in Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, the court held that the operation of a foreign language school could not be hampered by unreasonable and arbitrary regulations motivated by a desire to discourage the learning of a foreign language. In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, the Court held that the privilege of attending a free public school could not be withdrawn from children who refused to salute the flag or pledge allegiance to it. This, the Court held, was as much a form of coercion as the means employed in the Meyer and Tokushige cases. Since the legislature patently cannot coerce adult persons to learn the English language, it cannot achieve this end indirectly by withholding from them a constitutional right unless they do so.

Attendance at public school is a state-created privilege. Yet in the Barnette case the Supreme Court held that it might not be withheld from children because of their refusal to salute the flag. Voting is not a privilege but a right, and it therefore may certainly not be withheld either to penalize those who refuse to learn to read and write the English language or to induce them to do so. Unless literacy in the English language is actually necessary in order to be able to vote it may not legally be made so, and a person not literate in English may no more be deprived of his right to vote than of his access to courts of law or the benefits of social security or workmen's compensation.

It follows, therefore, that the only ground upon which the statute assailed herein can be justified is that literacy in English is a necessary (and not merely convenient) means for "the intelligent use of the ballot." Only if this court finds by clear, cogent and convincing evidence that a person literate in a language other than English cannot intelligently exercise the ballot, can the statute assailed herein be upheld.

Moreover, it is not unreasonable to suggest that the burden of establishing this necessity is upon the State. The right of American citizens to vote in elections is a precious one, of which they should not be deprived except for the most grave reasons. It is not enough that there is a rational connection between the means and the end. Nor is it enough that persons literate in English may exercise the ballot more intelligently than those literate in Spanish or Yiddish. That college graduates may exercise the ballot more intelligently than elementary school graduates would not justify disenfranchisement of the latter. To justify the deprivation of so fundamental a right, the State must establish that such disenfranchisement is unquestionably necessary to avoid a clear and present danger to the integrity of the electoral process.

Background of English Literacy Qualification for Voting

In determining whether literacy in English is a necessary qualification for intelligent exercise of the ballot, it is relevant to consider the purpose for which the qualification was prescribed. An examination of the background which gave rise to the requirement indicates that its purpose was not to assure a more effective and intelligent exercise of the franchise on the part of voters, but partly to influence acquisition of the English language by the foreign born population and partly as an act of prejudice and discrimination against discrete and insular minorities. The proposal first received active consideration in New York when it was presented to the New York State Constitutional Convention of 1915 by Mr. Gordon Knox Bell and Mr. Charles H. Young. The debate surrounding its introduction is extremely enlightening.

Mr. Young in introducing the amendment, stated "That in these troublesome times there seems to be no greater duty upon the people of the State of New York than the duty of making our foreign born population acquainted with American institutions and thus giving them at least an opportunity to acquire patriotism from knowledge of our history and government." 3 New York State Constitutional Convention 1915, Revised Record, 3001, 3004. He pointed out that in New York over 30% of the population was foreign born. "What," he continued "we are after is patriotism as well as literacy and we cannot have it unless the people understand the English language * * * More precious than even the forms of government are the mental qualities of our race. While those stand unimpaired all is safe. They are exposed to a single danger and that is by constantly changing our voting citizenship through the wholesale but valuable and necessary infusion of Southern and Eastern European races, whose traditional heritances are wholly different from our own, without education, we shall imperil the structure we so laboriously struggled to maintain." Id. at 3011-3012.

In support of the proposal Mr. Bell said: "Gentlemen, we must stop to think of what we are. This is not a question of nations, it is a question of races, and when all is said and done there is not a man in this room who dares deny that we are an English race, born and bred and brought up with the traditions of the men of England; of Anglo-Saxon stock." Id. at 3015-3016.

Louis Marshall, the famed constitutional lawyer, moved to strike out the word "English" from the proposed amendment. In support of his proposal Mr. Marshall said: "I have offered this amendment because I am not one of the English race. There is not one drop of Anglo-Saxon blood that courses through my veins, and yet I think that I have as much an appreciation of the spirit and genius of our institutions as has any other member of this body. It seems to me that those gentlemen who have introduced this measure, and those who have in such unmeasured terms approved it, are contributing to the Know-Nothing idea. To think that nobody shall be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage in this state who is unable to read and write English is to think that nobody can have the spirit of Americanism or the spirit of patriotism who is unable to read that language. I have no objection to a requirement of a literacy test, so far as the exercise of the franchise is concerned, but I do object to making that test the test of the English language alone. There are thousands of people in this state who are well educated citizens, who are intelligent men, who know all that need be known about the nature of our government, who are much more intelligent than many of those who can read and write English, and yet who cannot read that language * * * Let me tell you, for example that there is in this state a body of people numbering about a million who read the Yiddish language. Many of them cannot read any other language. Most of them read newspapers published only in that language. I have before me a list of five newspapers published in the City of New York, whose average daily circulation in Yiddish is upwards of 500,000 in the aggregate. * * * These newspapers are wide awake. They reach an intelligent reading public, a reading public which obtains its opinions with regard to public affairs largely through their columns. They are publishing daily reports concerning what is going on in this convention, with regard to the work which is here done. I have had occasion to read a number of these papers in the last few weeks and I find that they treat this convention more fairly than a certain portion of the English press of the City of New York. * * * These people cling to their language out of sentiment. * * * These people would resent as an insult any measure introduced into this constitution which would say that if they read the Yiddish language alone and cannot read English, they are ignorant, unintelligent, unfit to exercise the right of suffrage. * * * We are told here that these people because they may not be able to read the English language, because they came to our shores as refugees from oppression, ready to devote themselves and their thoughts and their minds and their hearts to the development of this country, who are able to read and write a language through which they can gain knowledge and information in regard to the affairs of this country, are unfit to exercise the right of the franchise. * * * There is no reasonable objection to the test that a citizen shall be obliged to read and write, but there is also no reason why he should be compelled to read and write English alone." Id. at 3017-3020.

Mr. Nathan Burkan, in opposing the qualification requiring the literacy test in English, stated: "The highest and most priceless privilege of a citizen is the right to participate and have a voice in the government - the right to vote for all officials and for the adoption and rejection of fundamental laws. * * * In its final analysis the arguments of the proponents is that this bill will elevate the electorate in respect to education and intelligence and will make for universality in the use of the English language. The way to educate the electorate, to make it intelligent is not by disfranchisement but through the instrumentality of your schools and institutions of learning. * * * It is abhorrent to believe that those who toil by the sweat of their brows, who create and improve prosperity, who aid in the development of the great resources of this state and in the building up of its industries and commerce shall be disfranchised because they cannot comply with an irksome test." Id. at 3152.

Mr. Arthur Baldwin stated that: "The greatest privilege that any country can confer upon its citizens is the right to participate in government, the right to vote. It is a privilege which dignifies that citizenship and knits the recipient to the body politic." Id. at 3156.

Mr. Peter Donovan in opposition asserted that "* * * the fact that a man cannot read and write English does not necessarily imply that he cannot vote intelligently." Id. at 3158.

Mr. Mark Eisner agreed on the ground that "There are many men in this city today who can only speak and write in German or in Yiddish of in some other language who are better qualified to vote on Election Day than some others who are masters of the English language and literature. I believe this amendment is * * * another piece of reaction * * * and for the reason that it is not a true test, not an honest test, not the kind of test which will bring forth the best from among our citizenship I * * * vote No." Id. at 3158.

Mr. Abraham Harawitz echoed these views, stating that "I am strongly opposed to any measure which will curtail the right of citizenship simply because a man cannot read and write the English language. I know people who can read and write German, French and Italian, who are probably more educated and who probably understand our American institutions much more readily than some of our citizens born in this country." Id. at 3168.

On the other hand, Mr. Frank Mann, echoing the prejudice against foreigners expressed by Young and Bell, asserted that the arguments of the opponents convinced him to vote for the requirement because he believed those people who read foreign newspapers were a menace to this country. Id. at 3163.

Perhaps the most eloquent expression of opposition to the proposed amendment of literacy in the English language was stated by Robert F. Wagner, later to become United States Senator from New York, and one of the greatest leaders in the struggle for equality and tolerance. Mr. Wagner said: "The Proposed Amendment provides that no person shall be entitled to vote unless able to read or write the English language. Obviously the proposal is directed against the foreign born American. * * * Remembering that the great mass of foreigners that come annually to our shores are assimilated into and become part and parcel of the American people because they strive and hope and succeed in acquiring the right to vote, can you not recognize in the amendment a clandestine effort to prevent this assimilation of alien blood into our citizenship and to segregate and exclude the foreigner from the rights, the privileges and the opportunities which we have always held out to all men?" Id. at 3022.

"* * * In so far as you dare to go, you take from him [the foreigner] the opportunity and the privileges which your ancestors enjoyed when they like the immigrants of today found in this land a refuge from the very spirit of intolerance and hate which finds expression in this amendment. * * *" Id. at 3023. "If the literacy test was not applied to the Irish and the German, why should it be applied to the Jew, the Italian or the Slav of the new immigration? Like our ancestors, they are now fleeing from ignorance, from inequality; like our ancestors they expect to find here freedom and equal opportunity. Are we going to deny them an equal opportunity?" Id. at 3024.

"If literacy were a valid test of voting, do you know that nearly 50 per cent of our early settlers * * * would not be entitled to vote? * * * Would we disfranchise our ancestors merely because they could not read or write the English language? * * * there is no good reason whatsoever for the adoption of this amendment. It comes before this body without the sanction of public sentiment, without the prestige of expert opinion, without the support of reason or logic. * * *" Id. at 3026.

The proposal was put to the Convention and was defeated by a vote of 77 to 67.

This was in 1915. By 1921, the political climate of the nation and of the State of New York had considerably changed. Liberalism and hospitality towards the foreign born was replaced by a fear and prejudice against all foreigners, and particularly against those who came from Eastern and Southern Europe bringing with them a culture and language which was strange and frightening to many native Americans. That was a period when many Americans believed that the welfare of our country demanded the elimination of cultural differences. Homogeneity was the goal and would-be immigrants were welcomed or excluded in accordance with unproved assumptions of their assimilability, Immigration Commission Reports, Sen. Doc. 758, 61st Cong., 3rd Sess. (1911); Hearings before House Committee on Immigration, 67th Cong., 3rd Sess. (Nov. 21, 1922), p. 279, et seq.; House Report 350, Part 2, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. (1924); Davie, World Immigration. People who boasted of being 100% Americans were looked upon with favor, while "hyphenated Americans" were in disrepute. Hayes, Essays on Nationalism, pp. 239-40.

This adolescent period of ultra nationalism and chauvinistic culturism expressed itself in a variety of legal measures throughout the nation. In Oregon, for example, Ku Klux Klan elements in the state succeeded in procuring the enactment of a law prohibiting all private and parochial schools. Meyers, History of Bigotry in the United States,

293. At the same time, a number of states enacted laws making it a crime to teach foreign languages to children. In upholding one of these laws, the Supreme Court of Nebraska explained that the "* * * legislature had seen the baneful effects of permitting foreigners, who had taken residence in this country, to rear and educate their children in the language of their native land. The result of that condition was found to be inimical to our own safety. To allow the children of foreigners, who had emigrated here, to be taught from early childhood the language of the country of their parents was to rear them with that language as their mother tongue. It was to educate them so that they must always think in that language, and, as a consequence, naturally inculcate in them the ideas and sentiments foreign to the best interests of this country." Meyer v. State, 107 Neb. 657.

On the national scene, the United States Congress for the first time in its history enacted a restrictive immigration law designed to exclude or strictly limit immigration from non-English speaking countries. It incorporated into American law the racially discriminatory national origins quota system, a system predicated upon the very concepts presented in the New York State Constitutional Convention some five or six years earlier by Mr. Young, Mr. Bell and Mr. Mann. In New York State this temper of ultra nationalism and cultural chauvinism expressed itself in the enactment for the first time in its history of the law which is challenged in the present litigation. War brings many evils and one of them is an illiberality towards foreigners. Xenophobia is almost always a consequence of war and it certainly was an aftermath of the First World War. In New York, the xenophobia resulted in the adoption by the legislature and the people of a proposal which it had six years earlier rejected as discriminatory and bigoted. It was a law whose purpose was not to insure the intelligent exercise of the ballot but to elevate the English language and the English culture over all other languages and cultures.

We submit that this background must be given great weight in determining whether a requirement of literacy in English is necessary in order to achieve the only end that is within the legitimate competence of the legislature of the State of New York, i.e., the assurance that voters can reasonably understand the issues of the day and make an intelligent choice among competing candidates for public office.

Literacy in English and the Intelligent Use of the Ballot

For the following reasons, we submit that there is no such cogent proof that literacy in English is necessarily required for intelligent exercise of the ballot as would justify the denial to so many American citizens of the fundamental democratic right to participate in the selection of their goverment:

1. The literacy in English qualification is barely a quarter of a century old. For a century and a half the State of New York, beginning with its Constitution of 1777, did not require literacy in English as a requisite to vote. During that period many illustrious and great persons were elected to high office in the State of New York. Three of its governors became Presidents of the United States. Increasingly progressive laws were enacted by the State Legislature until the State of New York reached the enviable status of being in the forefront of progressive and enlightened legislation. Certainly during this period there is not the slightest evidence that the fact that persons not literate in English participated in the selection of the government was in any way prejudicial to the public welfare.

2. Even today more than three-fifths of the States of the Union have no literacy qualification at all for voting. Thus, in 31 of the 50 States, one need not be literate in any language in order to cast a ballot. Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 78 S. Ct. 985, 990. There is no reason to believe that the administration of the government and laws in these States is inferior to that in the other 19 States. Without regard to whether the requirement of literacy is reasonable, we urge that, in view of the fact that three-fifths of the States require no literacy at all, there is no clear need for the requirement of literacy in English.

It should be noted further that of the 19 States which do have a literacy requirement only 12 specify that the literacy be in English. Hence, of the 50 States in the Union, fully 38 States do not require literacy in English as a qualification for voting.

3. Whatever might be the case in respect to some minute and rarely used foreign language, literacy in so widely used a language as Spanish (and Yiddish) assures that the Spanish (or Yiddish) speaking voter can be fully enough familiar with the issues and candidates presented to him to make an intelligent choice.

There are three Spanish-language newspapers, having a combined daily circulation of 82,000, published and distributed in New York. Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights 1959, p. 67. Two of these newspapers, El Diario and El Emparcial, have a format similar to that of the Daily News and the Daily Mirror. Like their two English-language prototypes the first six pages of El Diario and El Emparcial are mainly devoted to current political and civic issues. The more significant political and civic issues are explored further by featured columnists and in the editorials. Prior to September 17, 1959 La Prensa was much like the World Telegram and Sun and the Herald Tribune in format and coverage. Since that date the more popular tablid form of layout has been adopted. However, the coverage is apparently as complete as before.

There are two Yiddish newspapers, the Day-Jewish Journal, having a national circulation of 65,000 and the Forward, with a national circulation of 80,000. The former also publishes a weekly organ. The Americaner, with a circulation of 20,000. There are in addition a number of weekly and monthly publications. These newspapers give detailed coverage to domestic news, emphasizing both American and Jewish aspects. In addition, they include extensive editorial matter commenting on the domestic scene. 8 Universal Jewish Encyclopedia 190.

Both the Spanish and the Yiddish newspapers use the same news services as the English press.

In addition there are a number of radio stations in New York regularly broadcasting news and news analyses in Spanish and Yiddish. These programs are listed in detail in the Spanish and Yiddish newspapers.

Literacy in English and American Democratic Policy

When the constitutional amendment of 1921 imposed literacy in English as a requirement for voting in New York, it altered a long standing democratic tradition in the American community. One of the fundamental premises of American democracy is that, except for the most cogent reasons, no person should be subject to the rule of a government in whose selection he does not participate. We declared our independence from Great Britain because its monarch and its parliament imposed taxation upon us without representation and subjected us to rule by legislatures in whose selection we did not participate.

The forward progress of American democracy has been towards the extension of the franchise. At the time that our Constitution was adopted only a small minority of the people were entitled to vote. The right to participate in the selection of the government was limited to adult, white males, who were citizens and who possessed substantial real property. Since that time each generation of Americans has acted to extend the ballot and reduce the limitations on its exercise. Thus, the first step was to remove the property qualifications. Then the ballot was extended to those who were not white. After that, the right to vote was accorded to women. Today, there is talk of lowering the age of voting from 21 to 18 years. Only the literacy tests run counter to this progress toward the universal ballot.

There is a valid reason to deny the right of the vote to persons who have not yet reached the age of maturity, or to those whose limited mental capacities render them unable to handle their own affairs. There is no valid reason to deny the ballot to a person who is competent to manage his affairs and to exercise intelligent judgment in respect to the issues of the day simply because he acquires his knowledge and information in one rather than in another language.

The 1921 provision manifested an urge towards a culturally monolithic society. This was even then contrary to the traditions of our country. See Kallen, Cultural Pluralism and the American Idea, passim. As Mr. Justice Douglas stated in Dennis v. U.S., 341 U.S. 494, at 585, "We have wanted a land where our people can be exposed to all the diverse creeds and cultures of the world."

Only recently, on September 9, 1959, the United States Commission on Civil Rights issued its report, "With Liberty and Justice For All," in which it dealt in detail with the denial of the right to vote on the basis of language. Three of its members went so far as to urge that the needs of our expanding democracy require that we sweep away all limitations on the right to vote except those based on citizenship, age, length of residence and institutional confinement. In urging this far-reaching proposal, to be embodied in a constitutional amendment, these Commissioners said (Report, pages 97-98):

> The proposed amendment is in harmony with the American tradition and with the trend in the whole democratic world. * * * The march of education has almost eliminated illiteracy. In a nation dedicated to the full development of every citizen's human potential, there is no excuse for whatever illeteracy that may remain. Ratification of the proposed amendment would, we believe, provide an additional incentive for its total elimination. Meanwhile, abundant information about political candidates and issues is available to all by way of television and radio.

The United States also condemned discrimination on the basis of language when it joined the United Nations and subscribed to the principles set forth in the United Nations Charter. Article 55 of the charter pledges the organization to promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion." (Emphasis added.)

The American policy with respect to the issue involved in this case was set forth by the United States Supreme Court in Meyer v. Nebraska, supra. In speaking of the statute seeking to prohibit the teaching of a foreign language to children, the Court said: "It is said the purpose of the legislation was to promote civic development by inhibiting training and education of the immature in foreign tongues and ideals before they could learn English and acquire American ideals; and 'that the English language should be and become the mother tongue of all children reared in this State.' It is also affirmed that the foreign born population is very large, that certain communities commonly use foreign words, follow foreign leaders, move in a foreign atmosphere, and that the children are thereby hindered from becoming citizens of the most useful type and the public safety is imperiled.

"That the State may do much, go very far, indeed, in order to improve the quality of its citizens, physically, mentally and morally, is clear; but the individual has certain fundamental rights which must be respected. The protection of the Constitution extends to all, to those who speak other languages as well as to those born with English on the tongue. Perhaps it would be highly advantageous if all had ready understanding of our ordinary speech, but this cannot be coerced by methods which conflict with the Constitution - a desirable end cannot be promoted by prohibited means." (Emphasis added.)

Conclusion

For these reasons, we submit that the provisions in the New York State Constitution and the Election Law imposing literacy in the English language as a prerequisite for voting and barring from the ballot persons completely literate in another language is unconstitutional and the decision of the court below should therefore be reversed.

SEMINAR ON AMERICAN RACIALISM

HELD BY THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION DIVISION

AT THE BROADWAY TABERNACLE CHURCH, NEW YORK CITY

on January 16, 1942

The seminar opened at 2.00 p.m. with words of welcome by Allan Chalmers, minister of the church. "This building was once burned down because of an abolitionist meeting held here", he said. "Any church that entertians such a seminar as this is put in an embarrassing position. Don't embarrass the minister by failing to measure up to the great problem and opportunity American racialism presents. This is a matter which calls for serious consideration and unfaltering action."

Mr. Chalmers introduced Donald Cottrell of Teachers College, Columbia, Chairman of the seminar, who said in part, "This is a new kind of thinking for me. The problem before us has timeliness and significance for the future. Racialism is both a condition which disturbs us and an opportunity for American society to reconstruct not only its form, but also its methods, its attitudes, and its sensitivity to human values. In this discussion we have an opportunity to consider what is perhaps the heart of a great reconstruction that is in process.

"I first want to make a very few remarks about the plan of the conference. I should like to express the appreciation of the American Missionary Association Division Committee, the agency of the Congregational Christian Churches dealing with this problem, to those of you who have come here to represent a great many different groups and people interested in the fields of education, religion, and race relations. I should like to tell you a word about how the calling of this seminar originated. The American Missionary Association Division Committee is the committee on policy as well as the committee on recommending specific action, and in its study of policies which should be followed by the Congregational Christian Churches, it has been confronted with the question: 'Has the line of development of the Association in the field of missionary education been successful, or has it become, in a large measure, ineffective in dealing with the problems of present-day American racialism?' The Committee feels that perhaps we have reached the stage where we should see new horizons in our policy and we felt justified in asking a group of people to confer with us on these problems. Miss Morton, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Brownlee, and I were asked by the Committee to make arrangements for the conference. Mr. Brownlee was asked to prepare a statement, which was mailed to all persons present today and to many others, and which I trust has made as profound an impression upon all of you as it has upon me.

"The most effective way we can open our meeting is to ask Mr. Brownlee to define the problem for this conference against the background of the ideas he has presented in his paper."

Fred L. Brownlee, General Secretary, American Missionary Association.

I am here to make a confession. As we look over the many years and review the history of the American Missionary Association down to 1942 and then face up on the issue of racialism, we are reminded that the fundamental purpose of the group here in New York which started the A. M. A. was to remove from American society the sins of caste. It was one hundred years ago that they consecrated themselves to this purpose. The Abolitionist Movement which they promoted and the Civil War which they sought to prevent led to Emancipation, after which they went into the business of establishing schools and colleges for the freedmen. There is no one here this afternoon who for one moment would say that these pioneers in education for Negroes made a mistake. They were very wise in their choice of a line of service. Many here this afternoon are graduates of those schools.

If Negroes were brought to the United States as slaves for economic reasons but later emancipated for humanitarian reasons, what is it that still keeps them in a bondage of tradition and custom more binding than chattel slavery? We call it racialism or racism, but that is but a rationalized name with which we cover the symptoms of the disease. Missionaries are in danger of becoming so pleased with what they have accomplished that they lose sight of major continuing problems. Our concern today is the major issue, the fundamental problem, the disease at the heart of white and Negro relations. In this seminar it is our hope that we may get down to the roots of the matter and discover tangible means of doing something basic.

My paper was written last summer. Since then, a great deal has happened. We have been wondering whether or not the world crisis in democracy throws into high light the question of democracy here in America. We are questioning the integrity of the United States in fighting for democracy while still so deficient in practicing it with reference to its minority groups, particularly the Negroes. We are eager for a searching consideration of the present issue according to the following statements and questions which are in your hands. Frankly, the American Missionary Association is hoping to get out of this seminar some suggestions, some counsel that will help in the formulation of policies for future major service, shall we say for the next century, or perhaps longer?

STATEMENTS AND QUESTIONS ON AMERICAN RACIALISM

A. Assumption of the Seminar

Back of the undemocratic treatment of Negroes in America lies a generally accepted, whether defined or undefined, doctrine of racialism.

B. Purpose of the Seminar

1. To face the issues of this assumption squarely in the light of past experience and the present world conflict.

2. To discover ways, if possible, whereby agencies concerned may function more effectively in the elimination of racialism in America.

C. Suggestions for Discussion

1. How does the present acceleration of interest in democratic government throw into high light the undemocratic treatment of Negroes?

   Is the dominant group in America primarily concerned about maintaining its way of life through its present form of government, and are we being called to arms to defend and make secure a form of government rather than the application of democratic principles in the whole of our social order?

2. How may those who care primarily about the application of democratic principles in the whole of our social order arrive at their goal through democratic processes?

   Shall the federal government step in and actually guarantee the rights and privileges of minority groups, or must we wait everlastingly for the collective expression of individual wills?

3. Since the roots of racialism lie more deeply imbedded than governmental treatment alone can extract, wherein have schools and churches been failing?

   What structural and functional changes must be made in schools and churches in order that they may help to make real the democratic ideal and the Christian social ideal?

4. Practically speaking, what may this seminar mean to each of the agencies and movements represented here?

   As for the American Missionary Association, it is open to suggestions and advice.

   How much of its present work among Negroes should it continue more or less indefinitely?

   Along what new lines, if any, should the Association proceed?

Bonislaw Malinowski, Anthropologist, Yale University.

I should like to direct my comments now to the assumption of the seminar. I think it would be well for some of those here who know their facts much better than I do to tell how this doctrine of racialism, which runs counter to older assumptions of our religion and our common unity as attested by science, is applied and why it continues to exist. What, in practical operating terms, is this thing we call "racialism"?

Edwin R. Embree, President, Julius Rosenwald Fund.

Mr. Malinowsky is asking for evidences of racialism. Racialism in Germany has become part of the national gospel. We deny racialism, yet we have it. In the case of the yellow race we have excluded them from citizenship. This includes some six hundred million people discriminated against because they are yellow-skinned. In the case of our colonial possessions, we never think of the Samoans as American citizens. Although we have owned these colonies since 1898, Congress has not even passed an act defining the status of the people living there. These brown-skinned Polynesians are not American citizens of the superior class. We moved into the white revolution that occurred in Hawaii to protect the Hawaiians from themselves, and have administered their country since 1898.

Less legalistic is our attitude toward the red Indians of this country. We practically eradicated them. In the case of the East Indians, we give them the same status as the darker peoples. The theory is that the white Western Europeans, in general the Teutons and Saxons (although we do extend it to include all white Europeans), are the ruling class in the United States and all other peoples are subordinate, their subordination being almost in direct proportion to the amount of pigment in their skin.

C. H. Tobias, National Council, Y. M. C. A.

I think America faces this present crisis with embarrassment because of the fact that it has tried to evade the application of the great freedom documents to the Negroes of America. The Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and the Declaration of Independence were all written and put into effect while Negroes were in slavery. They were not meant to apply to them, and when the Emancipation Proclamation was issued and the amendments to the Constitution guaranteeing full citizenship to all people were made a part of the law of the land, neither the North nor the South meant at that time, nor have either the North or the South since then showed any inclination, to take very seriously the guarantees in those amendments so far as the rights of Negroes are concerned.

That, I think, is the chief cause of the embarrassment at the present time. And that, I think, was the force of Pearl Buck's important letter of November 14, 1941, to the New York Times in connection with crime in Harlem. She called for a show-down, saying it was time to face the facts as they are and decide what we are going to do about our racial minorities in America. Shall we continue to get by on the basis of a common understanding among white people, or shall we say what shall be the status of the Negro?

William H. Kilpatrick, Teachers College, Columbia.

The answer to Dr. Malinowski's question is not so easy to give in logical terms because it must be descriptive of what prevails, and what prevails does not follow logic. I see four components that together approximate the situation.

First, the old caste system runs deep into our culture. In Europe there has been in many countries for a very long time the matter of classes. There are lower classes that are definitely fixed in their position, certain upper classes that are officially recognized as such, and middle classes. The people who settled this country brought with them a knowledge and, in some degree, a practice of that class system. When they introduced slavery it fitted very definitely into the old class system. In the South before slavery was abolished every Negro had to use the term "master" in addressing every white man. That same thing holds in India and Ceylon. Our forefathers brought with them that age-old caste system and slavery fitted into the pattern.

Second, psychologically there is a tendency to attribute the faults of an individual to the entire group. We divide "us" from "others"—the "we" group and the various other groups. When we are judging the misbehaviour of any member of our group, we blame it on him as an individual. When we are judging the misbehaviour of any other person, we attribute it to the group of which he is a part. Anything we do not like we tend to attribute to all the members of the other group.

Third, there is the matter of outward, visible symbols. People can think more easily if they have an outward and visible sign. The fact of color gives that sign. Mr. Embree could also have included the East Indians in the groups who are denied citizenship here on the basis of race. The Jews suffer the same way insofar as anybody can tell that they are Jews.

Fourth, the whole thing has certain metaphysical significances. We like to attribute some kind of metaphysical conception to give substantiation to our practices of racism.

Henry Noble MacCracken, President, Vassar College.

Because both anthropology and psychology are new we are still struggling along with a kind of folk anthropology and folk psychology that is not supported by the facts. For example, many people think that the brain of the Negro is inferior to that of the white man; that in certain racial groups hysteria tends to arise easily; etc.

Buell Gallagher, President, Talladega College.

We have looked at the wide-spread character of the disease of racism and have noted the need for a scientific attitude. It seems to me that the principal device used to perpetuate racism in America is segregation. That device is practiced universally in this country. Segregation can take place in many forms, and can be crude or subtle. For example, there is spacial segregation—"the other side of the tracks"; and temporal segregation, where the dominant group will permit others to attain a certain degree of achievement only after that stage has been reached and passed by the dominant group. Three principal characteristics of segregation are quite obvious. It is not segregation when we voluntarily choose to live by ourselves. At any time we wish to we have the option of moving back. I used to have a church in New Jersey and nearby was a wealthy community.

As you approached you saw a large sign which read, "This is a Christian community." What they really meant was "No Jews allowed". The people who lived in that community were not segregated although they lived apart. The Dunkards and other religious groups live by themselves as a closed community. Neither are they the victims of segregation, for they can change their status at any time they wish.

When people are not accepted by the dominant group, they are segregated. Segregation involves separation, subordination and compulsion. It can be done through the most polite etiquette. Always lurking behind this segregation business is compulsion. It is to be wondered whether the slow killing of the hopes, aspirations, and ambitions of a race over long years is not worse than physical lynching.

If we could find some point of strategic attack we could push forward. Therefore, I suggest segregation as that point of attack. It is highlighted by the segregation in the military service. Last night I listened to the heart-broken story of a mother. Her boy had yearned and hoped to be in the Navy. He had prepared himself through study for this and had come up for enlistment. Of the group that passed the examinations he alone was asked to furnish a character witness. This he did. Then, as they were all lined up, his name was called and the officer said, "Step out of line." That boy was willing to give all he had for the system that denies him the right to make the sacrifice.

Hortense Powdermaker, Queens College.

Dr. MacCracken has said that we are operating under a folk anthropology and a folk psychology. We are doing that not because these sciences are so new. The anthropologists have been extremely esoteric about their science and not until quite recently have any of them concerned themselves with problems of basic interest and with popularizing the results of their scientific work. I am unable to see why the basic facts cannot be made intelligible to a child of ten. We rarely have any work in anthropology until graduate school, and it is rather late to start there to develop new attitudes. The place to begin is in the early elementary grades. If we are to get out of "folk sciences" we shall have to push some movement to popularize these subjects.

Mr. Chalmers.

But can we change the child unless in some way we manage to change the society in which that child lives? We do not understand quite the tragedy of racism. We shall all sleep tonight without being too much worried that this hundred-year old problem of the A. M. A. has not been solved, but the victims of racism who must meet the problem personally, suffer continually.

Miss Powdermaker.

I do not think one can do very much with older people, but we should start with the young person. We can get quicker results with young children.

George E. Haynes, Department of Race Relations, Federal Council of Churches.

We are confronted with this fact, that the whole system of education is as yet at the very beginning of knowing how to train the emotions. The best review a committee of educators made last year of the whole literature in this area on the elementary school level came to the conclusion that our public school system is very much at the threshhold of this whole question and that the amount of real scientific knowledge about it is very small. We have made some experiments in the churches. It is well known that adults can learn as well as children can, but even there we do not know how to reach those deep feelings and emotions that lie at the base of our attitudes.

Rachel Dennis Du Bois, Intercultural Education Workshop.

In our school work we have been experimenting with the use of the festival to get various groups together. We believe it is better to work with small groups in face-to-face relationships. In one instance we found that the children knew of the existence of different nationality groups in the city, but beyond that they knew very little about them. So we took the children on a trip around the city to introduce them to the various communities at first hand.

We had difficulty in getting parents to attend Parent-Teachers Association meetings. We asked the parents to teach the teachers the folk lore, songs, and dances that they knew. We tried to get across the feeling of the essential oneness of all peoples. It was in one of our circle dances that an Italian woman became the dancing partner of a Negro. Her displeasure was evident, but so skillful was he that she forgot her repulsion in the joy of dancing, and the man said later, "I think I saw a prejudice start to die." The following week four parents came to the meeting who had never been there before.

We must be more experimental in our whole approach to the problem of racism and try to reach the attitudes behind our intellect. People act according to how they feel about what they know, not on what they know.

Helen Kenyon, Director, Board of Home Missions, Congregational Christian Churches.

One of the fine young men in Poughkeepsie went to camp with very little prejudice against Negroes, but came back full of the attitudes of condescension and superiority toward them. It is apparent that our military organization helps to build race prejudice toward the Negro. What is to be done about it?

Rufus Early Clement, President, Atlanta University.

It was decided that Negroes shall not be deprived of the opportunity to attend graduate school because of their race. Several things have happened and several things have not happened as a result of that action. Some of the states have dodged the Supreme Court decision. Two or three have attempted to do something in a minor way to satisfy the letter of the law. Some have set up scholarship funds for out-of-state study. Some have set up graduate schools in not too strong Negro institutions already in existence. By and large, very little has been done in a constructive manner at all. However, that is not to say that the Supreme Court decision was not worth while as a starting point.

Oscar E. Maurer, Minister, Center Church, New Haven.

In Maryland a Negro has been graduated from the school of law and one is now registered there, but no Negroes may register in other departments of the graduate school. Generally speaking, Negroes are not welcome in graduate schools.

F. D. Patterson, President, Tuskegee Institute.

The increasing participation of the federal government, to a certain extent at least, is going to be wholesome and important in working in the direction of the solution of the problem of better education. This is one of the things we need most. We have a tremendous group of people totally without education, both white and Negro, and they must have the opportunity they now lack. Federal government aid is good, and we have a long way to go before it becomes a danger to our democratic principles.

Stewart G. Cole, Service Bureau for Intercultural Education.

We are aware of the hardship worked on those who are discriminated against. But what effect does discrimination have upon persons who practice it? The people discriminated against cannot fail in time to get a sense of inferiority and suspicion. The very best efforts put forward by white people to help are frequently rebuffed because from their long experience Negroes have learned to be suspicious. This complex problem has now reached large proportions and the disease cannot be cured readily.

Oswald Garrison Villard.

The colored people are seething with indignation. Here we are calling for a remedy to overcome race prejudice and injustice, and the government we have chosen to be the government of all the people discriminates in a national emergency when we need every man we can get. What is the use of talking about schools and education? It seems to me that talk of education and leaving it to the schools is often the last refuge of a thwarted reformer. There is only one side to this question, not two. The very people we have put in office are the ones who are practicing discrimination and thereby arousing dangerous feelings. Some of my Negro friends have plainly said they hope the colored man on the other side of the globe will teach the white man a lesson. The United States fails to live up to its pretensions. Are we going to let Secretary Knox say no colored man can serve his country in the Navy? Are we going to continue the policy of permitting no colored man to serve in the Marine corps? This is the place where we must take our stand and we must not be deterred. Some say it is embarrassing to bring up this problem now. It is never embarrassing to a righteous man in a righteous cause to stand up for the Constitution.

Lester B. Granger, National Urban League.

We must insist that the government take a more active stand for the rights of minority groups. I am concerned about some of the practices carried on by the government in the national defense program. Every person here knows the way in which the Office of Production Management has pussy-footed, quibbled, and lied in order to protect the right of Negro citizens to work on defense contracts. The way in which reactionary cliques are able to govern is by the power of appropriation. For example, a House Committee is said to have blocked the Federal Works Agency to the point where Negro defense housing has been reduced and re-designation has been made for white workers. In Detroit dwellings for five hundred Negro families have been re-designated for white workers due to pressure brought to bear on the Federal Works Agency.

George W. Crawford, Lawyer, New Haven.

I think those who get into this area sometimes pass this matter over lightly and say that the government ought not to be appealed to, that we ought to use other means. The good that can come out of government intervention is not to be minimized. However reluctant the southern states are to carry on graduate education for Negroes, the decisions at least look in the right direction. It is true you cannot go the whole distance and you cannot entirely rely upon what may come out of government intervention, but it is also true that we should expect as much as we can get and insist on getting as much as we can from that source. Those interested in legislation in this area well know how frequently when we have sought to get civil rights bills in the northern states which will protect Negroes in public places, someone always says, "You cannot legislate morality into the people". Of course you cannot legislate morality and develop people's attitudes, but you can help, and if the legislature always waited until the general attitude reached a certain stage, there would never be occasion to pass any laws at all. While there are other means of approach and other techniques, nevertheless we ought to appeal to the government for assistance.

Arthur Spingarn, President, N. A. A. C. P.

The Levy Act, which is the New York civil rights bill for Negroes, has been resorted to in many more instances than happens to get into the papers. The problem has been to get other states to approximate this Act.

Mr. Brownlee.

Is the federal procedure which compels citizens to fight in time of war a justified procedure for a democracy? If so, then is it any less democratic for the government to decide what should be done in giving full citizenship status to Negroes? In other words, must not the government step in if we are not to wait forever for the development of proper attitudes on the part of the people?

Mr. Cottrell.

I am going to suggest that we move on to our third question and, as soon as you are ready to do so, directly into the fourth question on this list. The Committee has no intention of casting this seminar into a rigid mold and placing an interpretation upon the function of the session. Consequently we invite you to add to the interpretation which we have placed on this paper and to revise it. The problem then, if you are in accord with my sense of our meeting, is "Where has the work which we have tried to do in this matter been improperly conveived, and secondly where has the work been ineffective?"

Mr. Clement.

That is a question which the government itself asks when you begin to question what they are doing. Are we agreed that a truly democratic society is one in which there is no discrimination based on race or color?

G. E. E. Lindquist, National Fellowship of Indian Workers.

In the seminar on race relations held by the Home Missions Council a resolution was passed calling upon the Office of Indian Affairs in Washington because there was a move on foot to segregate North American Indians in special military units. The resolution asked that the Indians as citizens get the same rights in the Army and Navy as other citizens do. Today the American Indians are not segregated in any unit, but enlisted as any other American citizen. This appeal to the government may have turned the trick.

Mr. Haynes.

Government reflects the attitude of the majority that can enforce its will on it. One of the reasons why we do not get more of those things we expect from the government is that the weaker minorities cannot get their will across to the government. In order to be successful, interested groups must keep close check on measures and follow them through. That is the way government gets things done. If we could get the church people all over this country to realize that if they would awaken to some of these things, and if they would become interested, government would change.

Mr. Spingarn.

I do not think this is the time for action. One of the tenets of equity is that no one can come into court without having clean hands. We have talked about education. We forget that 95% of the people we want to teach are filled with prejudice. If you let the great majority of teachers teach race relations, we would get nowhere. We are impatient with the government. How can churchmen who practice race segregation go to the government and say that they should not have segregated regiments when they have segregated churches? We cannot wait till the war is over. We should continue education. We cannot wait the hundred years or the thousand years more. We have got to do something now. The first thing is to reform ourselves as a body, but as individuals we can do something and I think we ought to address ourselves to those questions.

Mr. Maurer.

Connecticut has resisted federal pressure to defer Negroes from the draft.

Mr. Crawford.

Under the practice of the selective service act the divisional commanders of the various corps areas have very largely under their control the apportionment of quotas within their areas. In one division it was specified that the quotas for that section should be exclusively limited to white selectees and that Negro selectees should be deferred. The white people themselves protested against this discrimination because it meant that for every Negro who was deferred a white selectee was inducted out of order. This is contrary to the provisions of the selective service act.

The first board to object was one in which there was not a single Negro registrant. The objection was made on the basis that such discrimination was contrary to Connecticut tradition. Then there were many remonstrances from all over the state. State headquarters was notified that no selectees would be inducted unless all the selectees were inducted in the order in which they were reached. This has happened twice in that state.

Mr. Malinowski.

I want to support Mr. Spingarn's statement. We should come to the crucial point as quickly as we can. One of most important points is C-1 in the Statements and Questions on American Racialism.

I feel very strongly, not as a native citizen since I am not one, but as a native of this world and as a white man, that this war must be fought on all fronts—and that includes the moral front. As a teacher I believe in the value of the moral importance of scientific truths. We anthropologists know that the doctrine of racism is not based on scientific truth, and that it is as dangerous for those who are oppressors as it is for those who are victims. We are all deeply convinced that first and foremost no healthy body politic can exist in combination with the type of racial discrimination which the Anglo-Saxon world practices.

We have been discussing the privilege of Negroes to fight and die for this country. Are they going to fight for the government which has a color bar, or are they going to fight along side of us for true democracy? True democracy is certainly not the imposition of the will of the majority, but it takes into consideration the full rights of minorities.

I would like to question what Mr. Spingarn has said. Should we not fight this battle on all fronts? It is true that not one of us has a clear conscience with respect to his professions and his practices. When I went into the South I was shocked to find that there existed there two types of Christianity, and came to the conclusion that God must have two bosoms in order to receive the faithful. I believe you are one step ahead of the Union of South Africa where the principle of racial discrimination is included in the documents of government. We must see that the government enforces as well as passes laws.

It is important that the white people be educated to the implications of racism. Racism as a form of folk-lore would not live two minutes if it did not have a whole block of vested interests behind it. When race prejudice is buttressed with a whole set of legal, economic, social and political vested interests, the fight is hard, and here I want to reflect on Mr. Brownlee's statement that "in one hundred years we have not solved the problem". We shall not be able to pass any world-shaking resolution here, but we insist that the flag of democracy has a very black stain on it and we should wipe it out.

C. S. Ledbetter, Minister, Charleston.

Such conferences as this one are apt to result in nothing because after much discussion we do nothing afterwards. If we could impliment some of the fine things said here and carry them out into the communities, that would be much better than waiting for children to grow up. Perhaps we could work together, without regard to race, behind a single project. In one city where the population is half white and half Negro, air raid shelters were constructed in the proportion of eleven for white people as against one for Negro people.

Thomas E. Jones, President, Fisk University.

Just what can we do here? This meeting in itself is an achievement. This group ought to be able to put some pressure or give some guidance or prick the consciences of people in this period of international fluidity that might keep alive and make effective the thing we have been interested in for the past hundred years. What will be the increase in national and state controls, is a real question for all of us. This and similar groups who have something in their souls—it may be a kind of religion—should try to keep ourselves free from national and state controls to represent this idea as we work in our respective fields. Let us keep a conference like this together and let us resort to each other's minds and feelings and work in this period.

We have been suggesting ways and means of getting inside the door of state and federal affairs so that skillful and wise individuals can sit at the elbow of people making decisions and influence what is being said and done. Now I suppose that that technique has impressed us as being one of the most effective devices which has been used in the last few years. One of the most recent examples of that is the Churchill-Roosevelt conversations. Here were two white men planning the world. Now that has been changed, and I imagine some people in this room know why and how that change came about. The ramifications of that kind of thing involving millions of people are simply thrilling.

In times of war and crises where a decision may turn on a hair, it gives people who have such concerns great influence and power if we are right there at the moment. If we could look at our plan of strategy and re-examine and re-evaluate that technique, then, as the experience of the General Education Board has shown in the southern state departments of education, something could be accomplished if our representatives are at the key places.

Down at the grass roots we must keep experimenting on projects that are small enough—little social science laboratories—where we can discover new techniques of stimulating and controlling people's actions. The trouble with many of us reformers is that we try to take on the whole world, and when we find we cannot, we become disillusioned and defeated. I would say that there are three things we can do: 1) stay together, 2) get into the government, 3) experiment with small projects.

Mrs. Jessie Daniel Ames, Commission on Interracial Cooperation.

The same people that make up the government also make up the churches. You cannot have a democracy when one-third of the population cannot vote. There has been a recent decision of the Supreme Court which held that the primary is an essential step in the selection of political candidates and as such is subject to the regulations of the United States.

Our Commission has been working through the churches—the white women of the churches. You know one thing that the South respects is the Supreme Court of the United States and our consciences are never quite comfortable in evading its decisions. Therefore, it is a great step forward when the Supreme Court passes laws which will insure a more perfect democracy, for although at first the South may not follow the spirit of those laws, eventually it comes to observe them. We need federal aid for public education. To that end we need to have bill S-1313 passed. We need money in the South. We need help. We are going to have segregated schools in the South for many years to come. But there is no reason why we should not have equal opportunities for both races and we have got to get the money because we have not got it.

The opposition to this bill has come out of the North. We have got a lot of liberal teachers in the South, but they have got to get more money. The white teachers are not going to vote to have their salaries cut to assure equal salaries for white and Negro teachers. Education is of prime importance in helping to eradicate racialism in the South because even if a law should be passed declaring the poll tax illegal, we of the South could devise more ways to disenfranchise Negroes than you Northerners could think of if you lay awake many, many nights.

When twelve of our thirteen southern states eliminate Negroes from a democratic election, how is it going to look to other nations? This year our candidates must not make race a political issue. Our allies include many colored peoples. We must get our candidates to see this. The women of the South are doing a perfectly courageous piece of work on the race problem. But you must help us. Pass bill 1313.

Ralph C. Jenkins, President, State Teachers College, Danbury, Connecticut.

Racism is a big problem, but instead of attacking it in all its ramifications, why don't we concentrate on one issue at a time, such as, for example, the elimination of discrepancies in Negro and white salary scales for teachers?

William N. DeBerry, Minister, Springfield, Massachusetts.

It seems to me that the implication of Mr. Spingarn's statements was that the Church had better clean house before making demands of the government. I am very sure that, as someone has suggested, we have to fight this battle on all fronts. However, in spite of all their shortcomings, we know that the major achievements in human betterment have come through the school and the Church.

John D. Banks, Pilgrim Fellowship of the Congregational Christian Churches.

The educational means which are available include not only books and schools, but also movies and the radio. For example, the Columbia School of the Air of the Americas does more good in the very area we are now discussing than almost anything that has been attempted by us. I think it is time that money be spent to insure education that will do the most good and be most effective. There are people who are interested in movies who are waiting for such groups as the Federal Council of Churches or any interested group to start something that might be termed perhaps "American Pictures, Inc." There are young people coming into the movie industry who would be good material to be put to work—young people who see the possibility of movies in an education larger and beyond that of books.

Very few of us realize that behind many of the stories we read in the newspapers there are certain small offices that are getting their projects across through free space offered to them in magazines and newspapers. Something like that needs to be organized along the line of American racialism--a kind of Information Bureau. There are young people coming out of school each year who are interested in that kind of thing and there is no church group that will put them to work at it.

In the field of radio we are coming rapidly to the place where the resources of the combined churches through the Federal Council could sponsor an hour at a good time. Dramatic presentations of the place of the Negro people in American life are a possibility. Our education does not tend to keep up with the type of propaganda work which is done by people who use it for selfish purposes. We need to make more efficient use of available facilities. Some church money ought to go into the newer types of education.

Ambrose Caliver, U. S. Office of Education.

There are three points to which I would like to speak briefly. I wonder if you are aware of the fact that race antagonism seems to be increasing at a very rapid rate right now? It is unfortunate; we feel it keenly in Washington. There are many instances that I could cite which indicate that racial feeling is becoming tense. And, while we deplore the fact, there seems to be no organized group or individuals doing anything about it. What is true there, I am sure is true elsewhere. There seems to be a studied effort to thwart the movement that has gained impetus in recent years toward liberality and better racial feeling. Hence there is great timeliness of a meeting like this today, provided it results in some constructive social action.

Then there is the whole question of leadership. For some time I have taken the position that what Negroes need most of all is an emotionalized, intelligent leadership. We had emotional leadership for seventy-five years and it has taken us a long distance. During the past twenty-five years we have been getting a highly intellectualized leadership, so much so that we have had no zeal about what we have been doing. We now need a combination of the fire and zeal of a Father Divine coupled with the intelligence of a Charles Johnson or a Charles Thompson to fire people with an enthusiasm to do something constructive.

I want to call your attention to what seems to be a very constructive forward step now being fostered by the federal government. It is trying to address itself to some of these particular problems and even though it is not doing everything it could do, it is trying through the broadcasts entitled "Freedom's People" to do something. This series dramatizes the story of Negroes in American life to show the nation what Negroes have done in building up this country and to help Negroes develop a sense of belonging here. We have been trying to nationalize the whole picture in such a way that it would catch fire and give someone some enthusiasm and zeal about what Negroes have done and can do.

Harold Kingsley, Minister, Chicago.

Our question in Chicago is one of morale and attitude of the colored people toward this war. I have been in Cleveland, Washington, New Haven and Hartford, and every place I have been the colored people are talking about the same thing: what is to be our attitude toward this war? We have been faced with discrimination in industry and in the army and navy, and we feel in Chicago that while the navy was making so many changes in its personnel, our good friend Mr. Knox might well have been changed too. In Cleveland blood offered by colored donors was refused by the Red Cross. Every time the Negro turns around in this war business, he is rebuffed. We all have sons to go. I have two. Other families have more. It is difficult for us to arouse enthusiasm for the war. Negroes are approaching it with sullenness. We are going into it like dumb driven cattle. The enthusiasm that others are able to enjoy is not ours.

Now, we ministers are worried about that. We have to preach to our people about being Christians and fighting for their country. We are not interested in a racial war and every time a high official is quoted in magazines on his epithets against the yellow Japanese, we have an abhorent feeling.

William J. Schieffelin.

It seems to me that we are so close to the situation in its darker aspects that we do not see the grand vista beyond. Many years ago Tenneyson wrote the following lines:

"For I dipped into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;

Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;

Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rained a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue."

But the poet who made those predictions, which today have been realized, also wrote the following:

"Till the war-drum throbbed no longer, and the battle-flags were furled
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world."

If he spoke truly in the first instance, why not in the second? Why don't we look ahead and see that even though our democracy is not perfect, we do have a wonderful prospect. Let us have the wider vision and the greater hope.

Evening Session

Mr. Cottrell.

What are the next steps for all organizations having these common concerns? Perhaps you will agree that we need to force ourselves to say in succinct terms what we think should be done about the matter of American racism. Where are we failing to do what we might do with better probability of making headway in our work? I think we need to focus sharply this evening on some agreements which may lead us to where we want to go.

Mr. Brownlee.

Mr. Easom, of the Division of Negro Education of the State of Mississippi wanted to be with us today, but he could not come. I have a letter from him which I would like to read in part to you.

> "From my point of view, it would be very short-sighted policy on the part of any church organization to discontinue its assistance to our Negro colleges in the South, just as I think it is short-sighted policy on the part of foundations to discontinue their work in Negro education. So far as the church is concerned, it might as well take the position that it should no longer preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, the founder of the church. The church has been doing this for many years; why not change to something else now? Such an attitude on the part of the church would be just as sane and sensible as a decision to discontinue aid to our institutions of learning.
> "The elimination of racialism cannot be done in a year, a decade, or even a century. I am convinced also that we have never gone about the solution of this problem as expertly as we should. We need to approach it from the standpoint of less emphasis on racialism and more emphasis on the common needs of all people in a community, in a section of our country, or in our country as a whole. This prejudice can be broken down. I have seen it done in Mississippi. It has got to be broken down, however, in the right way and in the course of time.
> "It is my earnest hope that our churches and even the foundations will yet re-consider and stay with this program in the Deep South. I am afraid that it will be a sad day when they all pull out and leave the field entirely."

Mr. Embree.

I want to bring you the greetings of Will Alexander who came to New York last night purposely to come to this meeting but was called back to Washington.

I would associate myself in general with Mr. Easom's remarks to the extent of saying that so long as there is a dollar in the Rosenwald Fund treasury, that Fund will have Negro education as its chief interest. I hope that the American Missionary Association will also give the welfare of Negroes its main attention for the next century.

I want to make a special suggestion in the form of a motion. It seems to me that we are at the opening of another era not only in America, but in world affairs. I do not know that that era is going to be any better, probably it will be worse. But at any rate, a great many of the traditions and norms of history are being shattered and there is an opportunity now for some quite new things and for organization on a world basis. There has been some reference made already to movements that some of us have been fostering to bring America into a more intimate relationship with some of our colored allies as well as with our Anglo-Saxon allies. I am convinced that either we shall make a peace that will include on a democratic basis all the races of the world, or else in the next generation we shall have a real war—a war in which these submerged peoples will no longer content themselves with their status. I do not know whether we can persuade anybody that the way to avoid another war is to organize a real democracy of nations. We certainly were not able to organize a real peace at the end of the last war. A democratically governed, united nation in the future will place the American Negro in a larger framework of world democracy in which the Negro plays an important role.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I should like to move that:

> It is the sense of this meeting that the American Missionary Association be asked to appoint a commission on racism and international relations; and that the American Missionary Association be asked to implement that commission with an initial operating budget so that material can be gotten together and the various forces in this field can be rallied.

There should certainly be a budget of five or ten or fifteen thousand dollars. When and if that commission is appointed, I should like to see on it not only those of us who are old wheelhorses in racial work, but such persons as Pearl Buck and Margaret Mead. They are tremendously interested and ready to be active in the total question of world democracy. The bringing in of such minds as these will greatly stimulate the thinking and add a great deal to the power of such a commission.

Mr. Embree's motion was seconded.

William F. Frazier, Executive Vice-president, Board of Home Missions of the Congregational Christian Churches.

I am much interested in any practical comment on this situation with which we are dealing today. Last week I had dinner with six colored men of Atlanta; men about as prominent in the business life of Atlanta as you can find. I asked them the question we are now discussing. One of them said that the most important thing the American Missionary Association could do is to assist Negroes to get the ballot. In Atlanta there is a group of people wearing a blue button saying, "I am a qualified voter, are you?" It is important that Negroes should have the right to vote in the primaries. They are not able at present to vote there in any main election.

Another one of the men said, "That is all right, but when you have added the Negroes to the list of voters and see how incompetent they are from the economic standpoint, you have simply added a group that can be manipulated and bought, so you have added nothing fundamental. I have had the same thing said to me by several Negroes in two Connecticut cities, the feeling being that such men as have access to the better type of job have it because of a white sponsor. But now the white sponsor is disappearing and without a sponsor it is hard to break through any economic level and what remains is primarily domestic and agricultural work.

We have to ponder if there is any way to get at the bottom of this economic problem. We are a nation of 126 million with 14 million who have not had access to the training or privilege of functioning in the life of the nation in such a way that they can make a real contribution. The two problems we face are 1) Is there any way to get at the question of providing a political foundation? and 2) Is there any way of getting at economic fundamentals?

Our friend from Mississippi has suggested that we should support institutions of education. But the man in that group that I talked with, who is connected with the schools, said that the majority of Negro graduates are going into the public schools to teach and whenever a Negro becomes a teacher he must have a closed mouth and cannot take part in the life of the race because of the politics of the school machinery in which he finds himself.

I feel that the statements of these men were significant. One felt that the essential thing was to deal with the political question. Another felt the essential thing was to some way break open the iron bar that has shut so many of the race out of economic development. A third felt that the general approach in our educational system has not been to help the whole race but rather to help a few get into a type of job where they could make a fair living.

Horace Mann Bond, President, Fort Valley State College, Georgia.

I would defend the processes of education and also those institutions in the South which train Southerners to work in a southern setting. If we can imagine the Negro population in the South and in the North without the work of the graduates of such schools as Atlanta, Fisk, Lincoln, and others, I think you would have something very much worse than anything we now have.

I have been made to realize from my experience in Georgia that there is no need for a Pollyanna frame of mind and certainly we cannot look for the millenium in the next century. But we realize our difficulties. If we will look back a few years, we will all be convinced that the condition of the Negro population is far advanced from what it was. I am not being at all complacent, but I think the contribution of the A. M. A. schools in training these people has been one of the most significant in the development of American civilization. I am happy in what has taken place; and if we can have the fortitude to realize that we are going to have our ups and downs but will adopt a perspective that will carry us through many years, I can think of no contribution that can be made in any of these fields more satisfactory than that promised by the slow process of educating people with character and intelligence to work with people in both the South and North regardless of war, bitterness, and the obstacles we face now.

Mr. Jones.

Agreeing with all that has come out of our discussion, I would like to come back to the motion presented by Mr. Embree. If we can throw our whole attack in the next decades on racialism, we would have more chance for success than in anything we can think of. Of course we cannot legislate for the A. M. A., but in that area it seems to me we should be able to interest new foundations. A number of them have come into being and scarcely one of them has taken any interest in the race question. I think it is because they have not been interested in the old pattern. Everyone is looking for something that will be effective in this new world situation. It is not enough to ask the A. M. A. or these foundations set up on a continuing basis to do this. Could we not go on record as a group to keep thinking in the direction of racial work, sweep in new minds and new forces, and keep working at the people who are going to sit around the peace table and those back in the grass roots about this thing in the period of reconstruction and confusion that is bound to come when the firing stops? Could we not be sensitive in that area and see that somebody is at the right place to assure that those groups working in the problems of racial minorities have support and guidance? In those ways we could become a bulwark and a force in this new period in our attack on the race question.

I should like to see also that we agree that we cannot solve these problems out of our throats. The hymn book and Bible are very well, but we have got to preach with our muscles in projects, in physical reconstruction, in ways backed up by the soul that will not give in, bow and die. If we could apply this and not get lost in the details, I believe we could get somewhere.

Mr. Haynes.

Our Federal Council of Churches has a Commission on a Just and Durable Peace that is dealing with the international aspects of the post-war era. I think they are going to deal with the international aspects of racialism. They have felt that America's impact on the whole situation is most unique and that there will be a place for all of the groups that are trying to work out a common procedure. The Commission is to be set up to represent the conscience of America. If the commission suggested by Mr. Embree is to be set up, we hope that it will be done in consultation with other organizations that might be interested so that whatever is done represents a cross-section of the agencies that will be able to make it effective; that what comes out of this process will in some way be implemented.

Mr. Crawford.
